Term, 1832, I find no trace of such a circumstance. The rule was moved for on the ground that it appeared on the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness that there was a written agreement or lease, which was not produced, and the rule was granted, suggesting a stet process. This case is by no means a sufficient authority, and no other was cited which is in point, nor are we aware of any. This objection cannot therefore prevail.—p. 646

GIBBS, J. observed, that the practice of the Court of King's Bench as to the costs of the witnesses' return, was clearly ascertained to be such as was contended for by the plaintiffs. The reporter, in the decision in Schimmel v Louzada, had omitted there to state one part of the practice in such a case in the Court of King's Bench, namely, that in that Court the costs of his return were given. Their practice was certified to be that there the costs of bringing a witness over were not to be allowed, the costs of his detention were to be allowed, and the costs of his return were to be allowed, but the plaintiffs were met by the decision in this Court, that the costs of sending back the witnesses are not to be given.—p. 91

COTTON, L.J.—The case is quite different from the case which was relied upon in the Court below, of Berdan v. Greenwood. There the Court was satisfied that the reason given for the plaintiff's not coming to England was a pretence, and was only brought forward to enable him to avoid being cross-examined in Court. The Court said they would not assist him in that scheme, and that if his evidence were material to his case, he must come and give it in person. That authority, we think, does not apply to the present case.—p. 528.

ESHER, M.R.—In consequence of the case cited [Kemp v. Tennant] we have communicated with Matthew, J., and he tells us that he never meant to say or to cite Mr. Justice Wills as having said that the grant of a commission was ex debito iustitie in the sense in which the expression was used by the plaintiff's counsel in argument. It is clear that according to the established practice it is a matter of judicial discretion, and the commission ought only to be granted on reasonable grounds being shown for its issue.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The case of Thomas v. Stutterheim was cited, which is referred to by Mr. Day in his book on the Common Law Procedure Act (8rd ed., p. 245). The headnote of that case does not correctly report the decision. The Court there doubted whether they had power to make an order absolute in the first instance for the examination of a witness on the point of death, the application not being incidental to any motion or summons. Mr. Day seems correctly to give the result of the case when he says, "It would seem that the action is intended only to provide evidence upon otherwise pending motions or summonses." This case is not, therefore, at all inconsistent with the construction we are now putting on the statute, and it appears to me that the construction is in accordance both with the natural meaning of the terms used and the reason of the thing—p. 185.

SELBOURN, L.C.—Now I assume that there is no objection in a case in which the Court thinks it right to an order being made ex parte for the examination of witnesses de bene esse. There may be many cases in which the ends of justice may require it, but every such order must be taken subject to being discharged if any person seeking to discharge it can show that it was not proper because not necessary for the purposes of justice, and I cannot think that the rather authorities, such as that before Lord Eldon of Bellamy v. Jones, and others which have been mentioned, really meant more than this, that prima facie, and for the purpose of the question, whether the order was regularly made ex parte or not, if it was brought within a certain category of cases it would be right and not irregular to obtain it ex parte. I do not understand Lord Eldon as having meant to lay down even as to those cases in which there would be sufficient prima facie ground for obtaining an ex parte order to examine witnesses de bene esse, that no reasons or grounds could be shown why, upon a motion to discharge such an order consistent with its formal regularity, it should be discharged.—p. 8.

CAIRNS, L.C.—The case of Wright v. Wilkin appears to have come before the Court upon a very unusual and, I should think, irregular application. I take it that the course that would be pursued would be this.—If a witness, or his counsel, thought that he was being unfairly dealt with upon an examination, he might refuse to answer a particular question, and upon that refusal the matter might be brought before the Court, who would decide whether the examiner was pursuing a proper course or not, in allowing the witness to be treated as a hostile witness. It is, however, unnecessary now to decide that question. I only refer to it lest I should be thought to have assented to the view that the examiner is powerless in a case of that kind.—p. 129.

Small v. Nairne (1849) 13 Q. B. 840.

DENMAN, C.J.—I am tempted to remark, for the benefit of the profession, that Espinasse's reports, in days nearer their own time, when their want of accuracy was better than it is now, were never quoted without doubt and hesitation; and a special reason was often given as an apology for citing that particular case. Now they are often cited, as if counsel thought them of equal authority with Lord Coke's reports.—

COLLINS, L.J.—That case [Ridley v Sutton] was decided in 1863 and it is very important to see what it did decide. As the law then stood, applications of this kind were regulated by sect. 9 of 1 W. 4. c. 23, which provided that the costs of any examination ordered under sect. 1 should be costs in the cause unless otherwise directed, either by the judge who made the order for examination, or by the judge before whom the cause might be tried, or by the Court. Now the Court of Exchequer, in dealing with an application under that section arrived at the conclusion, as it seems to me, that the section itself did not apply at all to a case where, in point of fact, the examination so taken was not used at the trial, and therefore they said that the rule of the section—that the costs of the examination were to be costs in the cause—did not apply in such a case, because the examination was not read in evidence. . . . Rightly or wrongly that is the basis of the decision, and I think it was a decision upon the circumstances of that particular case, that the question was not one of discretion at all. The Act did not under the circumstances, allow the discretion or let in the rule that the costs should be costs in the cause. Therefore, in effect, it was a decision refusing to exercise discretion. That was the view taken by the Court of Exchequer, but almost simultaneously there was a case of Duke of Beaufort v Earl of Ashburnham, in the Court of C.P., where that Court took quite a different view of sect. 9, and considered that they undoubtedly had a discretion. . . . Leaving then those authorities as they stand, I come to the rule under the Judicature Act in order to see which of those two authorities should be adopted. Now there are the words of the rule before us—Ord. LXV. i. 27 (29) [the L.J. read the rule].

Now, what is the meaning of that? Surely it makes the standard for consideration, not the event which actually happened, but whether, when the order for examination was applied for, proper prudence was exercised, or whether there was "over-caution, negligence, or mistake." In fact it makes the standard or governing point for consideration the state of things before the legal adviser at the time he makes up his mind. Now the question is, which of these two standards the taxing master should have selected in order to decide whether the costs of this examination were "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice"—the time when, and the circumstances under which the legal adviser had to act, or the circumstances that took place at the trial itself. In my opinion he should have chosen the first alternative. The matter does not rest merely on the rule, because we have a decision of Field, J., since the Judicature Act, 1873, and it appears to me that he has lent the weight of his authority to the construction I am now suggesting. That is in Delarogue v SS. Orenholms. That case is very much in point—practically on all points with the present case. . . . The master disallowed the costs of the examination on the ground that it had become unnecessary to use it at the trial. In giving judgment Field, J., said this—"It was said in argument that this was done by reason of a rule that the costs of a proceeding should not be allowed unless it was actually used for some purpose." That looks as if Ridley v Sutton had been brought to the learned judge's attention in the argument. Then he proceeds "I should require to be better satisfied of the propriety of such a rule than I am at present before I acceded to it." That is really an expression of dissent from the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Ridley v Sutton. I think, for the reasons I have given, that the requirements of the rule have been abundantly satisfied, and that we are not fettered by the decision in Ridley v Sutton.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—(After having shortly stated the pleadings, and in particular the objection raised by the replication that the en. sa. was absolutely void, having issued on a judgment more than a year old without a scire facie, his lordship said.) The plaintiff argues that it is absolutely void for this fault, relying on the language of this Court in Mortimer v Piggott, in which it is so decided. That case, however, did not require the doctrine now called in question, and is actually reported in 1 Adolphus & Ellis without its being laid down. We are now required to consider it, and are satisfied that it is in that respect erroneous.—p. 710.

PARKES, J. (for the Court).—This Court decided (Cheston v Gibbs) that the 14th section of the Bankruptcy Act affected the operation of the writ, and did not merely direct the application of the money levied under it, and that the sheriff was a wrongdoer in acting contrary to the statutory direction coupled with the direction of the writ. We never held the writ to be void as the Court of Queen's Bench seems to have supposed, in Graham v Witherby, . . . and from that they deduced the consequence that it was void altogether, and so the defendant's writ in that case was therefore the first valid writ. We never meant to say more than that the sheriff in disobeying the writ, and the clauses in the Act of Parliament directing its operation, was dealing wrongfully with the goods which, but for the writ, would be the property of the assignees, and therefore responsible in an action of trover. We cannot, therefore, consider that either of these cases bind us as authorities.—p. 278.

CAVE, J.—Those cases, however, are not applicable to the case now under discussion, first, because in those cases there was a subsequent sale by the sheriff which was invalidated by the express words of the section, "no creditor shall avail himself" of such execution; and secondly, because, if the first execution was void, the subsequent one, having been executed by seizure before the fiat, was within the exception contained in the 14th section. In this case, on the contrary, there are no words in sect. 14, sub-sect. 2, which invalidate the sale by the sheriff, and indeed under that clause the sale must necessarily take place before it can be known whether the execution creditor will or will not ultimately be entitled to the proceeds; and secondly, the words of the statute do seem to imply that the benefit of the execution is to be transferred from the execution creditor to the trustee for the benefit of the creditors generally.

ESHER, M.R.—The learned judge who tried the case, being of opinion that nothing indorsed on the back of the writ, whether written by the execution creditor himself or his solicitor, can be a direction to the sheriff, gave judgment for the defendant. . . . Is that view sound? It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that it is not sound; and in support of that contention Jarman v. Hooper has been cited. But it is said by the defendant's counsel that this point was not under consideration in Jarman v. Hooper, and that that case is therefore nonauthoritative upon the point. It is quite true that all that that case decided as to the liability of the execution creditor was that words written on the back of the writ by the solicitor would bind the client, because the writing was within the scope of the solicitor's authority, but when the case is carefully looked at, it must be seen how closely it resembles that now before us. . . . The only point taken on behalf of the execution creditor was that the indorsement was written by the solicitor and was not authorised by the client, but for all that the Court must have seen the indorsement; it was staring them in the face, and it is plain from the question of Maule, J. during the argument that the question whether the indorsement was a direction or not was present to their minds; and when the Court came to the conclusion that the execution creditor was liable because the solicitor was authorised to make the indorsement, it seems to me that the case is a clear decision that the indorsement was a direction. But then it is said that Jarman v. Hooper is inconsistent with Childers v. Wooler. Now, in Childers v. Wooler the Court of Q. B. could have declined to regard the decision in Jarman v. Hooper as good law, or binding upon them, but it is to be observed that they did not assume to overrule it.

Cockburn, C.J., delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court in Childers v. Wooler, distinguishes Jarman v. Hooper upon two grounds: first, that the indorsement in the latter case was much more specific than that in the case then before the Court, and, secondly, that in Jarman v. Hooper, the defendant, by attending the interpleader summons and insisting that the goods were rightly seized by that act, ratified the seizure, which was for his benefit. I confess I am unable to follow either of these distinctions. I cannot see that the indorsement was more specific in the one case than the other; and as to the ratification, it is plain that, if there was ratification, the matter ratified must have been capable of ratification, in which case the ratification adds nothing and makes no distinction, or if the matter were not capable of being ratified, there could be no ratification, and the distinction falls to the ground. . . . It seems to me that one must take the same view of Jarman v. Hooper which has already been taken by this Court in Smith v. Keal (9 Q. B. D. 849). . . . Therefore if one of these two cases, Jarman v. Hooper and Childers v. Wooler, is to be overruled, it is not Jarman v. Hooper, and if it is not to be overruled, it appears to me to be in point—pp. 276, 277, 278.

BOWEN, L.J.—"The law," says the Court in Semayne's Case, "prohibits the destruction or breaking of any house." The landlord (like the sheriff in a civil suit) could only, therefore, enter by an open door or an open window—per ostia et fenestras. In Penton v. Browne it was indeed held that a sheriff for the purposes of execution might break a barn which was in a field, as distinct from a barn which was parcel of a house, but the Court agreed that if the barn had been adjoining to a parcel of the house, it could not lawfully have been broken. The law so laid down in Penton v. Browne as to a sheriff's right with regard to a detached outside barn in a field, appears to me to be a departure from older law. This view, whether right or wrong, was at all events considered in Brown v. Glenn not to be applicable to a landlord's distress. I should (with submission) have myself supposed that the sheriff in a civil suit had no more right to break a detached inclosure than a landlord's bailiff had. In Brown v. Glenn a locked stable door was broken open. The stable was not within the curtilage of the dwelling-house, but nevertheless the Court held that the fact of the stable door being locked of itself rendered the distress unlawful in so doing they affirmed and followed a far older decision of Hardwicke, L. C. J., in the Summer Assizes at Exeter, in the year 1755, who held that a padlock put upon a barn's door could not be opened by force to take the corn by way of distress (Vin. Ab. "Distress," E. 2, 6; cited also in Pentou v. Broune, 2 Wm. S. 284, c., note 2, 6th ed.). It is a misconception to suppose that an outhouse within the curtilage enjoys less immunity than a disconnected outhouse. Pentou v. Broune shows exactly the reverse, and in Ryan v. Shilcock it seems conceded that the landlord may not break open the outer door of any building whatever. The language of Lord Coke is general to the effect that the landlord may not open gates, nor break down manures.—p. 390.

KAY, J., after discussing Pentou v. Broune and Broune v. Glenn and Somerset's Case, continued: The case then came before the Court of Q. B. in Hobson v. Thellusson, which was an action against a sheriff for having failed to seize goods under a writ of execution. As reported in the L. J. Reports, Lord Blackburn in that case said "I do not think that the sheriff's officer was bound to go off at once and take a crowbar to break open the doors, although no doubt that might have been done, as the goods were in a warehouse, and not in a dwelling-house. It does not appear that there was any reason for his being bound to use the utmost possible diligence, he went soon after he received the writ, and on his arrival found that the doors were locked. He was not bound to use more than reasonable diligence. He certainly might have broken the doors open, and have seized the goods." Mr Macaskie pointed out that these words are modified in the report of the case which appears in the Law Reports, and he suggested that Lord Blackburn, when he revised his judgment, intentionally altered this passage. But both reports, when they are read carefully, seem to me to come to the same thing. . . I therefore think that the doctrine laid down in Pentou v. Broune was approved of in Hobson v. Thellusson. It was said, however, that it was disapproved of in American Concentrated Alkali Corporation v. Hendry. There Bowen, J., after referring to the earlier history of the doctrine of the inviolability of the outer door of a house and its precincts, said: "In Pentou v. Broune it was indeed held that a sheriff for purposes of execution might break a barn which was in a field, as distinct from a barn which was parcel of a house, but the Court agreed that if the barn had been adjoining to a parcel of the house, it could not lawfully have been broken. The law so laid down in Pentou v. Broune as to a sheriff's rights with regard to a detached outhouse in a field appears to me to be a departure from older law." But he does not say that in his opinion the decision in Pentou v. Broune was not law, neither does he suggest that it ought to be overruled.—p. 72.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The defendants are persons entitled to legal remedies in real estate devised to them by this testator and the appellant has obtained a judgment against them, and cannot get his money. The question is whether he can, whilst their interests are reversionary, obtain a sale of their reversionary estates. Having regard to those cases [In re Hamilton (1887) 55 L. J. Ch. 282; 31 Ch. D. 291—C.A.] and In re South, and the reasons we have given, it appears to me that we are now asked to do what we have no jurisdiction to do. There is nothing really in the cases cited by Mr. Stevenson which in any way affects that view and though perhaps there are two cases to which he has referred which might at first sight appear to be favourable, the point was not raised. As to those cases, In re Jones and In re Clasper I doubt whether they were decisions upon reversionary interests at all: they are reported that I cannot tell, and therefore I cannot net upon them.

CHITTY, J. held that in the circumstances the plaintiff was right in moving the Court in the first instance for leave to issue sequestration instead of proceeding by summons in chambers, as in Snow v. Bolton inasmuch as, the case being one which must have been eventually argued in Court, he had thereby saved the costs of the proceedings in chambers

But if that case is examined, it will be found to differ essentially from this, for there the deed which was relied on as taking the stock out of the provisions of the Act did not actually transfer the shares, which were already mortgaged, but only rendered it incumbent on the defendant to procure their delivery over to the trustees, that they might execute the trusts of the deed.

WOOD, L.J.—Warburton v. Hill might, if the authorities referred to in Scott v. Lord Hastings had been before me, have been rested on a higher ground than the one I took, namely, on the ground that a charging order against the debtor could not affect property which he had previously assigned. In the course of my judgment I said: "The date to be looked to is not that of obtaining the order sub, but, subject to operation of the 15th section as to intermediate charges, the real charge is acquired when the charging order is made absolute." I there used expressions which were not necessary to the decision, and which I am inclined to think erroneous.

MATHEW, J.—The Court of Appeal in Drew v. Willis held that it had no power to set aside a charging order which had been properly made, but in that case there was no appeal against the granting of the charging order. In this case the defendant is appealing against the order making the charging order absolute, and he may be seriously prejudiced if we refuse this application—pp. 171, 172.

Italy v. Barry (supra) and Finney v. Hinde (1879) 48 L. J. Q. B. 275; 4 Q. B. D. 102; 10 L. T. 193, 27 W. R. 413.—COCKBURN, C. J. and POLOCK, B., discussed.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Therefore it is necessary for the application of this Act [the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 14] and for obtaining a charging order that you must have a person against whom a judgment has been entered, and the procedure shows that the person against whom judgment is to be entered is the judgment debtor, who must be in a position to show cause why the charging order should not be made. In other words, he must be alive; and it was settled as long ago as Finney v. Hinde that if you had a charging order against a dead man, it was useless, and that you could not convert that into an order absolute. That is all Finney v. Hinde really decided. . . . The only case that shows any doubt upon what I am saying, and which is to a certain extent inconsistent with it, is Italy v. Barry. In that case someone had a charging order against the testator. The practice under the Common Law Procedure Act was followed there, and the executor was made a party, and Wood, L.J. and Selwyn, L.J. thought that was equivalent to a judgment against the executor. Whether that was equivalent to it under the old practice or not it is unnecessary to consider; but, be that as it may, the decision was that they would make the order absolute for what it was worth. The L.J.J. held that if a man had an advantage, the benefit was not to be taken away from him. There was no ground for the injunction in that case, except that put forward by the appellant in that case—that the Court would stop a race between creditors. At the same time I recognise that there are observations in the judgment of Wood, L.J. which make me doubt whether I am quite right in saying that you cannot obtain a charging order against the executor even now, if there is any method of getting judgment against him. I doubt whether there is any method under the present practice, and I am not quite sure whether there was any such method even when the practice of entering a suggestion was in vogue. The result is that this order was altogether wrong. There is no precedent for it, and it is an experiment that I certainly hope will not be repeated.—pp. 181, 182.

BULLER, J. — Another thing to be observed in the case in Comyns is, that it was decided on the authority of a case in Roll. Abr. 919, which it is there said was never denied. From that circumstance, I am inclined to think it passed without much consideration, for the doctrine in Roll. Abr. is contradicted in 2 Lev. 90, and 1 Lev. 158 and 236. . . It seems, therefore, strange that the Chief Justice should have said in that case that the case in Roll. Abr. had never been doubted; because these cases determined the reverse of the doctrine there contained — p. 131.

MALINS, V.-C.—It is very true that it was formerly held in this case, that where a power of sale was given by an executor upon a mortgage, the title under that power of sale could not be forced upon a purchaser. That case I had is cited by Lord St. Leonards (Sugden V. & P. p. 890, n. d. 14) as an authority. But I think (and indeed the learned counsel for the defendant has not disputed it) that the doctrine laid down in that case can be no longer maintained as the rule of the Court, for in Russell v Plaipe (supra), the M.R. decided directly the contrary, namely, that a good title could be made under a power of sale created by an executor. That case of Russell v Plaipe having been cited before the L.C. and the L.J.J. in Vane (Earl) v Riggall (supra), was commented upon by the L.C. who expressed his approbation of it, and I therefore think it may be considered as an authority upon the point. FAY, J.—Ray v Ray has been very properly relied upon. In that case the Court dissolved an interlocutory injunction, which had been granted on the application of a creditor of a testator, to restrain a creditor of the executor from selling the testator's leaseholds under an execution for his own debt. The point was not finally determined, but the Court thought the circumstances were such as to raise an inference of a gift by the testator's creditor to the executor. When another case arises in that form I shall follow Ray v Ray, but the present case is very different.—p. 101.

BROOGHAM, L.C.—The cases which have always been considered as going farthest in protecting the party dealing with an executor are Nugent v. Gifford and Mead v. Orerry (Lord). It is, however, impossible to read the argument of Lord Hardwicke in each of these decisions without being satisfied that he considered the knowledge of the executor's misappropriation as not distinctly brought home to the party. That there was notice of the representative character is clear, and that there was notice of the executor dealing with testamentary assets we may also admit; nevertheless, the whole argument appears to assume that the party dealing with the executor might suppose the executor had a right so to dispose of the property. "A purchaser from an executor," he says, "has no power of knowing the debts of the testator." Again, "If you can follow the property into the hands of the assignee, this would be saying that no man could have an assignment from an executor without coming into the Court of Chancery to have an account how he has distributed the assets of his testator." But there can be no doubt that subsequent decisions are difficult if not impossible to be reconciled with these two cases. What Lord Hardwicke lays down in Nugent v. Gifford would probably not have been so stated if Farr v. Newman (supra) had then been decided. Lord Kenyon had at the Rolls, in Dunne v. Ridgway (supra), expressed himself as strongly of opinion that Mead v. Orerry (Lord) went far, and he held that, though a person purchasing from an executor is not bound to see to the application of the money, yet that the purchaser taking with the knowledge that the money was to be misapplied, had no protection. Lord Thurlow in Scott v. Tyler (supra), says, that Nugent v. Gifford cannot be reconciled with Craze v. Drake (supra). And Lord Thurlow is known to have formed an opinion clearly against the bankers in Scott v. Tyler, though the matter was compromised. It is quite clear from what Lord Eldon says in the elaborate judgment in W. Lord v. Drummond (supra), where he minutely examined all the cases, that he considered Bunce v. Ridgway to have shaken Nugent v. Gifford and Mead v. Orerry, in so far as these cases may be supposed to establish any general principle—p. 355. And see post.

JESSEL, M.R.—The only remaining point is what period of time is sufficient to raise a presumption that the debts have been paid. Now upon that point, and upon that point only, I differ from Sabin v Heape. I think it is clear that ten years and a-half are not sufficient, but, as has been said, the line must be drawn somewhere. The question is where? In Sabin v Heape, the late M.R. held that the lapse of twenty-seven years did not raise the presumption. I think that period too long. In Forbes v Peacock (supra, col. 1064) the period was twenty-five years, which the V.-C. appears to have considered too long—p. 480. His lordship also referred to Bailey v Bailey (supra, col. 1062) and Stroughill v Anstey (supra, col. 1061).

BRETT, L.J.—Now, it seems to me that a reasonable and fair general rule of construction may be deduced from the decided cases, and that this rule is well stated in Hartland v Marrell (supra, col. 1062). There the M.R. says, "I am of opinion that when a testator derives all his real estate to his executors and directs them to pay all his debts, that constitutes a charge on the real estate, although they take no beneficial interest in it." Upon hearing those two cases read [Wase v. Hartington (supra, col. 1062), and Hartland v. Marrell], it seemed to me that you might extract from them a very good rule, viz., that where a gift is in the form mentioned in Hartland v. Marrell, the debts are charged upon the real estate, unless upon other parts of the will a contrary intention clearly appears. The rule, as stated in Hartland v. Marrell, with that proviso on condition attached to it, seems to me to be consistent with the authorities, and to be well stated in the passage from Bailey v. Bailey, which was read by the M.R.—p. 482. HOLKES, L.J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—The question whether the rule thus laid down (that where executors in whom real estate is vested for a legal estate in fee simple subject to a charge of debts are selling, a purchaser is not bound or entitled to inquire whether debts remain unpaid unless twenty years have elapsed from the testator's death) ought to be applied to the case of executors selling leaseholds arose in Whistler, in re. . . although the facts in that case are different from those which occur in the present, and although the contract was entered into within twenty years of the testator's death, it appears to me to be an express decision that the rule in question is not applicable to the case of an executor selling leaseholds. It is said however that this decision conflicts with . . . Molguena and White, In re (supra), a case which was not cited in Whistler, In re. In my opinion those decisions were not based upon the rule in question. The L.C. of Ireland, in giving the judgment of the C.A., says "There is potent evidence that the debts have, as a matter of fact, been paid. . . . The V.C. came to the conclusion that there was clear evidence before him that the debts were paid, and that the vendors were violating the trusts reposed in them. . . . We do not decide as to the limit of twenty years" (by which I understand the period fixed as the limit in Tinqueray-Wilkinson and Laidlaw, In re (supra) to be referred to), "but we think that the order of the V.C. was right, and that the vendors, not being able to say that there were debts still due, had no right to sell." That case seems to have been decided upon evidence that the debts had been paid, and that the executors who were selling were acting as trustees and not as executors. . . . [The Lordship then discussed Corser v. Cartwright, and continue.] It appears to me that I have the high authority of Lord Cairns and Lord Cranworth [in Corser v. Cartwright] for saying that where a person who fills the position of an executor is found selling or mortgaging part of his testator's estate, he is to be presumed to be acting in the discharge of the duties imposed on him as executor, unless there is something in the transaction which shows the contrary; and, further, that the contrary is not made out merely from the circumstance that the conveyance or mortgage does not purport to be executed by him in that capacity.—p. 306—309

ROMER, L.J. (for self, RIGBY and COLLINS, L.J.) —As a rule, the Court has no jurisdiction to give, and will not give, its sanction to the performance by trustees of acts with reference to the trust estate which are not on the face of the instrument creating the trust authorised by its terms. Crawshaw, In re . . . and Morrison, In re . . . are instances where the Court was asked to sanction steps to be taken by trustees which it thought unjustifiable, and which it declared it had no jurisdiction to authorise. But in the management of a trust estate, and especially where that estate consists of a business or shares in a mercantile company, it not infrequently happens that some peculiar circumstance arises for which provision is not expressly made by the trust instrument, and which renders it most desirable, and it may be very essential for the benefit of the estate, and in the interest of all the cestis que trust, that certain acts should be done by the trustees, which in ordinary circumstances they would have no power to do. In a case of this kind, which may reasonably be supposed to be one not foreseen or anticipated by the author of the trust, where the trustees are embarrassed by the emergency that has arisen, and the duty cast upon them to do what is best for the estate, and the consent of all the beneficiaries cannot be obtained by reason of some of them not being in jure or in existence, then it may be right for the Court, and the Court in a proper case would have jurisdiction, to sanction on behalf of all concerned such acts on behalf of the trustees as we have above referred to.—p. 718.

BYRNE, J.—In reference to the reports of that case [Loome v. Stotherd], which is stated with more detail in the Law Journal than in Simons & Stuart, I find that there were two points argued. The first point was a very important one, the judgment deciding that a devise had a right to retain a debt due to himself or to his trustees out of the produce of the estate devised to him, the other point being as to the costs of the administration—namely, whether they should come out of the estate in priority to the debt or not. . . The case has not got into any of the text-books to which I have before referred as being an authority for the proposition for which it is cited, nor is there any case in which it has been followed as deciding such a question. I have not, therefore, the same difficulty as if I had to deal with an old-established authority on a particular point. In any event I should have thought myself bound by the decision of the O. A. in Dunning, In re, but, as I have said, I do not think that Loome v. Stotherd is an authority for the proposition for which it is now invoked—namely, that a tenant for life velut que tenet is entitled to retain where there are trustees competent to sue for the corpus of the fund.—p. 157

WICKENS, V.-C.—There is a difficulty created by Hall v. Macdonald, but I am bound to say that for a great many years I have thought that case was not law. I remember making a note against it when it was first reported. I have no doubt whatever that Shadwell, V.-C.'s decision was right, but I cannot help thinking that Mr. Simons has misconceived the precise point of the case. In fact, he did not report the case for that point. It is mentioned incidentally, and one can easily conceive certain states of circumstances in which the decision would have been perfectly right without that expression having been necessary, or having been used. It seems to me that this case is, in fact, settled by principle, and that principle is so well established that I may venture to depart even from so great an authority as Shadwell, V.-C. There is no doubt as to the right of retainer against legal assets. There is also, I think, such a preponderance of authority in favour of holding assets like these to be equitable assets, that notwithstanding the decision in Lovgrove v. Cooper, I may so hold.—p. 791

COTTON, L.J.—I at first felt some difficulty about . . . Ferguson v. Gibson, but in my opinion that decision was quite right. There an estate was devised to a mother for life, and to the daughter after her death. The V.-C. determined that the widow, who was a surety for the testator by specialty in which the heirs were bound (and if she had paid off the debt would have had a right to the benefit of the specialty), not having paid it off, could only be treated as a simple contract creditor, and had no right of retainer; but that her daughter, who was entitled as devisee in remainder (not as devisee in trust for sale or subject to a charge of debts, but a devisee for her own benefit) and was a creditor by specialty in which the heirs were bound, was entitled to retain. That, in my opinion, was quite right, upon the ground I have expressed, that in the case of a specialty creditor where the heirs are bound, the common law right of action against the heir, by which priority may be gained, is not taken away, whereas a simple contract creditor can only obtain a judgment as against the real estate for the benefit of himself and all the other creditors.—p. 493. BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I will only add that Hall v. Macdonald is not to be relied upon as being any guide. I do not say that the decision was wrong, for I do not know the facts of the case. There is no reference to this Act of Parliament [3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104] in the report, and we are not told whether the devise was in trust for sale, or what the circumstances were. The decision may have been right, but the absence of facts makes it useless as an authority.—p. 484

KAY, J.—At first sight the decision in Williams, in re, seems to be analogous to the present case, but upon examination there is a considerable distinction. The judgment of the court was no longer a simple contract creditor, but had assumed a higher right than simple contract creditors in the distribution of assets, and the effect of placing special creditors for the purpose of distribution on the same level was not necessarily to put them after the judgment creditor. But here the executrix who desires to retain is only a simple contract creditor, and the law that she cannot retain against specialty creditors remains, unless the statute must be read that for this purpose, among others, the specialty creditors are of equal degree with the simple contract creditors. . . . I cannot help the conclusion that the Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 46) having augmented the fund for payment of simple contract creditors, has to this extent enlarged the right of retainer. In this respect I agree with Pearson, J.'s decision in Wilson v. Coxwell.—pp. 446, 447.

STIRLING, J.—In Williams, in re, the question arose how the position of such a judgment creditor [a simple contract creditor who had obtained judgment] was affected by the Act of 1869 [Hinde Palmer's Act], and it was held by Wickens, V.-C. that he was entitled to be paid in priority to both specialty and simple contract creditors. . . . That case, so far as I know, stands alone in the Reports. The other class of cases relates to the right of retainer on the part of a legal personal representative in respect of a debt due to him from the deceased; a right which can only be exercised in preference to creditors of equal degree. With reference to this right it has been decided in . . . Wilson v. Coxwell, Jones, in re, and Briggs, in re, that the assets must, in the first place, be divided rateably between specialty and simple contract creditors, and that effect is to be given to the right of retainer in respect of the simple contract debt due to the legal personal representative only out of the portion coming to the simple contract creditors. The grounds for the decision are thus stated by Kay, J. in Jones, in re. . . . I understand Williams, in re, to be there distinguished, because after the death of the testator the creditor had recovered judgment, and had thus attained a higher rank than he had at the time of the death. It is also distinctly laid down that the object of the Act of 1869 is "only to take away the priority of a specialty creditor over simple contract creditors, not to give any of them priority over him." I am not sure that Wickens, V.-C. took the same view.—p. 360.

YOUTH, J.—There is no case in which any distinction has been drawn between the right of retainer and the right of preference. In Tillot v. Byers (1878) 9 Ch. D. 568, 27 W. R. 148—M.B., it was pointed out that both these rights depend on the same principle. In Williams' Estate, in re (supra), the point did not really arise, but in Jones, in re, Calver v. Laxton, Briggs, in re (supra), and Wilson v. Coxwell (supra) (though not fully agreed) the point was decided as to retainer; and in Bentnck, in re (supra), the same principle was applied to the priority of a simple contract Crown debtor. I cannot decide in favour of the defendant's contention without going directly in the teeth of these decisions. It is said that I ought to follow Ormsmond, in re. I have, however, to choose, between that case and another of uniformly consistent authorities to the contrary dealing with the right of retainer. The case, as reported, is short, and not quite intelligible. The learned judge is reported to have said, "Cases have been cited to show that there has been some alteration in an executor's right of retainer." Now the report does not mention the names of the cases cited in support of that proposition, and none of them have been cited to me.—p. 244.

Richmond v. White (supra, col. 1072), explained and followed. Langley, in re, Johnson v. Langley (1899) 68 L. J. Ch. 361.

KEKEWICH, J.—I understand the principle of Richmond v. White to be that where money is paid into Court for convenience of administration the executor's right of retainer is not interfered with; but where that result follows not from convenience of administration, but because the executor is not a proper person to receive it, and the Court has appointed its own officer in his place, then his right is ousted, but so long as he is in possession of his legal rights as administrator, though under the control of the Court, he is not to lose his right of retainer. It is also said that he must be taken to have waived his right, and that argument is put on the ground that the parties were not aware of his rights. The answer to that is the answer given in Richmond v. White, namely, that it is not necessary to expressly reserve the right or to express that the order is made without prejudice to the right.—p. 362.

KEKEWICH, J.—In that case (Campbell, Ex parte) the question was as to a right of retainer apart from a right of proof, but the right which the V.C. says may be lost, forfeited, or released may be either a right of retainer or a right of proof, and he says the judge who decided Player v. Farhall (col 1071) thought that in that case the claim of the heir to retain was made too late. I should decide the present case in the same way as Player v. Farhall if I were satisfied that the right had been lost, forfeited, or released, but here I see nothing of the kind. . . . Then it is said that he (the applicant) has no right until he has established his debt, and for that the respondents rely on Harrison, In re. I confess I thought that the law was clearly settled—certainly it is engrafted in my legal mind by Nisbet v. Smith and by Erignau v. Gibson (col 1070). If Pearson, J. decided against or declined to follow these authorities, I should feel a difficulty, but it seems to me that he did nothing of the kind. In the first place, neither case was cited to him. The arguments did not go to this particular point. The judgment was a considered one, but Pearson, J. did not touch this particular point. What he directs his mind to is that there was nothing due to the executor before he was called on to pay. There is no debt in that sense, it is an equitable debt. . . . therefore the learned judge was correct in saying there was nothing due to him. . . . and then he directs his mind to the question whether there could be a right of retainer, saying that there were no assets, no money in his hands at the time the death matured—p. 121.

WRIGHT, J.—That case [Woodward v. Darcy] is mentioned in Williams on Executors (5th edition) p. 568, with approval. . . . I doubt whether it is the law now that the property in the assets is absolutely altered without showing assent or appropriation by the executor. . . . But here the assets are of much less value than here (i.e., the executrix) debt and it seems to me, in the absence of authority that it would be unreasonable to hold that she was bound to go through the form of selling before she could pay herself. There is no authority that she ought, except the statement in Chapman v. Turner, as reported in 9 Mod. 268. But that report is most unsatisfactory, and does not accord with the same case as reported in Viner's Abridgement. Executor," D. 2, p. 71, which is the only report referred to in Williams on Executors. In the absence of such authority, therefore, I think I ought not to hold that the executrix is bound to realise before she can exercise her right to retain. My judgment is confined to the case where the value of the whole of the assets is less than the debt due to the executrix.—p. 231.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, SIR P. JERRE and ROMER, L.J.).—It is not denied that she (the executrix) had a right to retain and might have exercised it before the order (for administration in bankruptcy of the debtor's estate) was made, or, to be more accurate, before she knew that an application for such an order had been made (Gilbert, Ex parte (supra), col 1073). But it is contended that, as she had not exercised her right before that date, she could not do so afterwards. The older common law authorities go far to show that if an executor was a creditor of his deceased testator, and had assets in his hands sufficient to pay his debt (and all others of a higher degree, if any), such debt was treated as extinguished. . . . Blackstone says so distinctly (vol. 3, p. 18). His words are "So much as is sufficient to answer his own demand is, by operation of law, applied to that particular purpose." Plowden goes further, and says that the property in the assets is changed—see Woodward v. Darcy. But this can only be true if the assets spoken of can be identified and appropriated to the debt which they have satisfied, and this presupposes the exercise of the right in fact; and in the case in Plowden it had been so exercised—see p. 184. Woodward v. Darcy was as follows: Luttrell was the obligor, and Woodward, the plaintiff, was obligee. Windham was Luttrell's executor, but Windham was dead, and his executors were the defendants, Windham was a creditor of Luttrell, and had retained assets sufficient to pay himself, leaving nothing for Woodward. The debts were all specialty debts, and it was held that the defendants were entitled to judgment. Until the executor does some act to show which assets he retains, it is obvious that the property in them cannot be changed. This had been noticed before in Gilbert, Ex parte, and Wentworth's Objection of Executors, cited in the margin of Plowden, p. 185. But it was settled that an executor sued by a creditor could give a retainer by himself in satisfaction of his own debt in evidence under a general plea of plene administravit, and that he need not plead a retainer specially—1 Wms. Saunders, p. 338, n. 6. The extent to which the doctrine that his debt was carried is further illustrated by the cases collected in Williams on Executors (5th edition), vol. 2, p. 1180. . . . It is quite plain from these authorities that the executor's right to retain assets in his hands was as against him treated as enforced as soon as he could properly enforce it. . . . It is true that an executor with a right of retainer has not all the rights of a secured creditor—see Lee v. Nuttall (supra, col. 1074).

He right extends both in law and in equity to all legal assets which he has in his hands, and these is nothing in sect. 126 [Bankruptcy Act, 1883] to deprive him of his right. The judgment of V. Williams, L.J., in Williams, In re (1891) 8 Morr. 65, supports this conclusion. Counsel for the appellant relied on authorities collected in Williams on Executors, vol. 1, p. 885, which show that if an executor dies without having exercised his right, his executor cannot exercise it unless he also represents the testator. But whatever difficulty there may be in reconciling these cases with Blackstone's statement above referred to, they are quite consistent with the right of the executrix to retain her debt as against the trustee claiming her testator's assets. A similar observation applies to Wigram, V.C.'s judgment in Burge v. Brutton. The only person who has a right of retainer is the legal personal CHITTY, J.—No doubt the law is settled in the case of a specific devise—that is a matter which lies outside the duties of executors, and a set-off is impossible. It is equally plain, on the authorities, in the case of a specific gift of leaseholds, that the rule laid down in Akerman v. Akerman extends to every gift of specific chattels. But if the proposition there is made as a universal one, that in no case of a specific gift can there be a right of retainer, then I am unable to assent to it, to do so would be to narrow the doctrine unnecessarily.—p. 188.

NORTH, J.—Willes v. Greenhill (col. 1080) and Akerman, In re, show quite clearly that the executor would be entitled to retain the debt from the son. Contra Rees v. Williams and Akerman, In re (supra), show that the lapse of time from the son's bankruptcy in 1859, or from the realisation of the security in 1869, both upwards of twenty years ago, would not affect their right to retain. . . In each of these cases [Cherry v Boulthbee and Hodgson, In re] the bankruptcy took place in the life-time of the testator, and the ground of the decision was that the executors were never entitled to the debt, but only to a dividend upon it. These facts are quite different from the facts in the present case. In the present case no one ever proved against the bankrupt's estate. . . Thore [Orpen, In re, col. 1079] the creditor had not proved, but there was a composition deed to which he had not assented, but to which the proper majority had assented, so that the composition became binding on all the creditors, whether assenting or not; and he being bound by the composition deed was in the same position as if he had proved; and that being so, it was held that there could be no retainer. Another case which was cited in support of the contention that there was no right of retainer is Rees, In re. . . The testator had proved in his life-time against a bankrupt to whom he had left a legacy, but the debt due on the proof was suspended by statute till after the date when the legacy was payable. It was held that the executors could not retain a legacy payable in present in respect of a debt that would not become payable until a future date. That case is, therefore, quite distinguishable from the present [His Lordship then discussed Whitehouse, In re, and continued.] Then the same thing is laid down by Lord Chelmsford in Stammers v. Elliott (supra, col. 1078) just as clearly. It is true that in that case it was a debt merely, because there the executor had proved. Those two cases are, I think, in point—p. 564

BUCKLEY, j.—The cases are numerous in which it has been held that executors and trustees have power to appropriate personal estate under such circumstances as arise in this case. For instance, in Elliot v Kemp appropriation of furniture, in Barclay v Owen, appropriation of a mortgage debt, in Richardson, In re, appropriation of stock in a brewery company, in Brooks, In re, appropriation of shares in a brewery company; in Nichols, In re, appropriation of stock; and in Waters, In re, appropriation of mortgages and other securities, were all held to be valid. . . There was no trust for conversion in Elliot v Kemp, or in Richardson, In re, or in Barclay v Owen (supra). In each of the other cases there was a trust for conversion. Counsel have not referred me to, and I have not found any case relating to appropriation of chattels real. The question I have to determine is whether under circumstances such as these a valid appropriation can be made of chattels real—p. 297. at all times to a decision of Sir W. Grant. but I think one may safely say it goes to the very outside of the doctrine, as that will was construed not to imply any trust whatever, especially having regard to the word "direction," which was there used. Lord Cottenham does not appear to have been altogether satisfied with Gibbs v Rumsey, and I apprehend no case would be decided according to it, where the gift is not precisely and distinctly in the words there mentioned, "to trustees and executors, to be disposed of in such manner as they in their discretion shall think proper."—pp. 1096, 1097.

VAUGHAN, B.—The duties of Holt, C.J. [“If A. employs B to work for C., A is liable to pay for it. An executor is not liable to pay for funeral expenses unless, he contracts for them.”], is explicitly at variance with the opinion of Lord Ellenborough [in Tugwell v Heyman], and, were it necessary, I should feel no difficulty in assenting to the latter authority; but it is not necessary to draw any comparison between the two cases, because, from the note of the former it does not appear under what circumstances that opinion was delivered. The latter is a case precisely applicable to the present, recognised in by the counsel, and confirmed, if confirmation were required, by the opinion of the C.J. of the C.P. I consider the burial of the dead to be a clear obligation upon the executor, and think that he is liable for the expenses incurred, if in his absence that duty be performed for him by another.—p. 37

CHITTY, J., after discussing Baker, in re, said: There has been delivered at the bar before me an argument to the effect that Kay, J.'s judgment [in Marsden, in re] was based upon an erroneous proposition—namely, that the executor was a trustee for creditors—and therefore it was said it was in substance an erroneous decision. From the report it would appear that the learned judge spoke of the executor as a trustee.

I think it is quite immaterial whether Kay, J. did, or did not, call the executor a trustee. The language I prefer myself using is, that he owes a duty to the creditors, both at law and in equity, to administer the estate according to the well-established principles. . . In Gale, in re, the V.-C. . . expressed himself thus: “Upon the authorities, and also upon the well settled rule of law, if you sue upon a devastavit, that is personal against the executor, and is barred by the six years.” I think he there enunciated the law correctly, and whether there may not have been some slight misapplication of the law in regard to the facts of the case and the mode in which it was shaped against the executors, it is quite unnecessary for me to inquire. I do not look upon that case as any authority that justifies the proposition that the executor, when simply sued as such, and simply charged with what he has received, and not sued, therefore, upon any devastavit at all can set up his own wrong, and then plead the statute by way of defence founded on his own wrong—p. 752

WOOD, V.-C.—How is a man, who has improperly got the property of a testator into his hands, to purge himself, except by putting it into the hands of the person who has a right to it? And if that be so, on what principle can it be said that, because there are matters of account, a suit must be brought in order to settle them? I confess I cannot see why. Then it is said that Lord Cottenham has decided otherwise in Carmichael v. Carmichael. But the remarks of Lord Cottenham were not requisite for the decision of the case, it was a dictum, and is in these terms (p. 103)—"How can you distinguish this case from one in which there are two executors, and one dies, and his representative accounts for his receipts with the survivor? That does not discharge him from the liability to account in a suit for the administration of the estate, and the authorities show that an executor de son tort cannot say he is so against those who change him as executor. He has all the liabilities, but none of the privileges that belong to that character." Now, I have considered that dictum with the respect that is due to so high an authority, and I confess I cannot follow the reasoning by which his lordship arrived at that conclusion. It is plain that an executor cannot discharge himself by accounting to his co-executor, because he is himself authorised, and it is his duty, to see how the assets are applied. When he has paid over the assets he is not discharged, he must see to part with possession of the assets to his co-executor, though he is not answerable for his co-executor's receipts, he is responsible for what he so pays over. But it may well be asked, what right have you to proceed against a man who has had wrongful possession of property; if he have discharged himself by making it over to the executor? What claim have you to say, "You shall not be discharged by the rightful owner, but we will unship all you have done, and bring a suit against you in respect of this property?" That is not the rule at law, it is clear, for an executor de son tort who pays over what he has received to the rightful owner before action brought is at once discharged. And I apprehend the rule here must be the same.—p. 37.

His lordship then discussed Sharland v. Mildon (supra), Hopner v. Summersett, Kewick v. Burgess (supra), and Foster v. Bates (supra).

[It was submitted in argument by Field, Q.C., that "if the executors named in a will intermeddle with the goods of the deceased before taking out probate they can be sued as executors de son tort, and it follows that their agents can also be sued. This was expressly held in Sharland v. Mildon, it as appears from the report in the Law Journal, the widow of the testator was named executrix in his will"]

BOVILL, C.J.—It is true that executors may be sued as executors by reason of their intermeddling with the goods of their testator before probate, and an executor so circumstanced appears in Webster v. Webster to have been called an executor de son tort; but this cannot have been intended to imply that he was a wrongdoer. It is clear that a person acting for an executor who has proved the will cannot be treated as an executor de son tort, and several cases show that the same is the case if he has not proved the will. This seems to have been assumed in Hopner v. Summersett and Cottle v. Aldrich. In the case of an intestacy, if a person who is subsequently appointed administrator intermeddles with the goods before obtaining letters of administration, according to Padget v. Priest (supra), both he and any agent employed by him may be treated as executors de son tort, but even this appears from Hill v. Curtis (supra) to be subject to some limitation. Sharland v. Mildon has been especially pressed upon us, the facts of that case do not very distinctly appear, but it is clear that the widow was there treated as a wrongdoer.—p. 117.

M. SMITH, J. to the same effect.

BRETT, J.—Sharland v. Mildon would, I think, be wrongly decided if it really bore the interpretation put upon it by Mr. Field.—p. 119.
[In note 2 to p. 115 of Sykes v. Sykes (L. R. 5 C. P.) it will be seen that an examination of the solicitors' papers in Sharland v. Mildon showed that the widow was not appointed executrix by the testator in either of the two wills left by him.]

TURNER, L.J. (after discussing the earlier cases said): It is not until we come to Beynon v. Gollins that I find any doubt suggested as to the liability of the wife surviving; but in that case Lord Thurlow appears to have held that she was not liable, for I think, that, looking at the fact of that case, as appearing in the note to Mr. Eden's edition of Brown's reports, it can hardly be doubted, notwithstanding the different reports of the case by Dickens, that it was so held by Lord Thurlow; although looking to the frame of the suit, I find the greatest possible difficulty in reconciling his lordship's view on that point with the decree which appears to have been made. Whatever weight, however, might have been due to this opinion of Lord Thurlow seems to me to be removed by the masterly exposition of the law upon the subject, which is to be found in Lord Redesdale's judgment in Adair v. Shaw and by the authorities which are referred to in that judgment; to which it may be added that the analogy to the case of trover, on which Lord Thurlow seems to have relied, seems to be answered by Bellew v. Scott (supra), which does not appear to have been cited in the argument before him. Upon the authorities, therefore, speaking with all respect to the V.-C., I think that the declaration contained in this decree cannot be supported, and I am confirmed in this opinion by that of Sir E. V. Williams [Williams on Executors, 5th ed. vol. ii. p. 1087], to whom a higher authority upon such a point as this could not possibly be found. His opinion is most decided in favour of Lord Redesdale's view.—p. 788. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J. concurred.

ROMILLY, N. v. Downe (Viscount) v Morris alone appears to militate against Burgess v Wheate, and if followed it would affect or qualify that decision, unless it meant merely to establish the proposition, which would be new, viz., that if a term of years is vested in a tenant, and subject to that term the reversion in fees is vested in another, if the tenant should mortgage his term and die without heirs and next of kin, then that in every such case the reversion of the fee would be entitled to redeem the mortgage of the term. The V.-C. however, in deciding that case, expressly admits the authority of Burgess v Wheate, and considers that it did not affect the case then before him,—p 712.

JAMES, L.J.—The V.-C. proceeded entirely upon Carter v Sanders, a decision of Kindersley, V.-C., no doubt entitled to great respect, as every decision of that learned judge is. But that decision was pronounced in very few words and without reference to Bain, Ex parte, which had been decided previously by the Court of Bankruptcy, a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, . . . In the present case Hall, V.-C. says, not only he takes that case as an authority binding on him, which no doubt it was, but that as had found its way into the text-books, he might possibly be claiming titles and the holdings of property if he were now to overrule it. I am bound to say I have been considering the thus all through the argument, and I cannot conceive the possibility of any disturbance of title arising from the overruling of that case. I can conceive the case of persons not being able to make title as easily and satisfactorily as they otherwise could, by reason of that case being in the way, but I cannot conceive of any person having ever obtained a title based on it. Therefore I think we are not in any way governed by that error to be deterred from the independent consideration of the present case by reason of the time which has elapsed since that decision was pronounced by Kindersley, V.-C., without it having been questioned, except by a way-station and clear expression of opinion by Lord Chelmsford, certainly not necessary for the decision of the case then before him (Time v Cresswell) upon the very same point,—p 699.

CAIRNS, L.C.—There is nothing in the Act (1 Vict. c. 26) to alter the well-settled rule of law as to the effect of a residuary devise when you know the time at which it was made, namely, that for the purpose of payment of debts it is to rank pari passu with the specific devises. Then, with regard to the authorities, it appears that Kindersley, V.-C. and the late M.R. took a different view from that which I have expressed, and Stuart, V.-C., Hall, V.-C., and Lord Hatherley, when V.-C., took the opposite view. But I feel bound to say that I look upon Hensman v. Fryer, decided by Lord Chelmsford, as a distinct decision on this particular point. It was a most carefully considered judgment, and was a distinct expression of opinion by the judge who was then the head of this Court, that the Wills Act had made no alteration in the law in this respect—p. 141.

JAMES, L.J.—I well recollect the decision of Lord Chelmsford in Hensman v. Fryer, and the extent to which it was canvassed at the time, and I was never able to see what answer could be made to the principle on which he based his judgment, namely, that the Wills Act said that the will must be construed as if it had been made just before the testator's death, and the Court had only to consider what would have been the consequence if it had been so made. But, independently of that, I think that the decision of Lord Chelmsford is binding upon the other branches of the Court. It was a decision deliberately pronounced for the purpose of settling the differences which existed between the various branches of the Court, and I think it ought to have been treated as settling the question—p. 142.

Hensman v. Fryer, ad. followed, as to the second of the two points decided by it.

MALINS, V.-C.—It is urged upon me that the decision in Hensman v. Fryer has been recognised by the C.A. as a binding authority in Lancefield v. Iggulden, and that I must, therefore, follow it in the present case. The point now raised, however (whether, where the residuary personal estate of the testator is insufficient for the payment of his debts, pecuniary legacies and the residuary devise will be called upon to contribute ratably to make up the deficiency), was not in question in Lancefield v. Iggulden, and I think I am still at liberty to decide this case as I decide Dugdale v. Dugdale. Being of opinion, therefore, that the rule in Hensman v. Fryer as to contribution is not correct, I must continue to follow the old rule.—p. 627.

HALL, V.-C.—I am of opinion that it must be considered settled that pecuniary legacies must be resorted to before real estate for payment of the debts of the testator. The decisions in Collins v. Lewis and Tomkins v. Colthurst are in accordance with the decision of Lord Cotton in Mirreton v. Scarfe (supra, col. 1091), and I shall follow them. I do not consider that in so doing I am acting in opposition to the authority of the C.A. in Lancefield v. Iggulden.—p. 111.

Luckcraft v. Pyddham (1879) 48 L. J. Ch. 636.
HALL, V.-C.—Simmons v. Rose certainly is the strongest authority in favour of the general proposition that where there is a direction to convert the converted fund must be applicable for payment of legacies or debts, as the case may be, which are not directly ordered to be paid out of that common fund. But the L.C., in giving judgment on the second occasion, seems to have felt on looking into the authorities that it was necessary, if I may say so, to advert in rather a marked and special manner to the fact, which existed in that case of the property being directed to be treated as part of the personal estate of the testator—p. 636.

Trott v. Buchanan (1885) 54 L. J. Ch. 678, 28 Ch. D. 449; 52 L. T. 248; 33 W. R. 339.

PEARSON, J.—The statement of the facts of that case (French v. Chichester) as given in 2 Vern. 568, is very meagre. But there are fortunately preserved in Lincoln's Inn Library the cases both of the appellants and the respondents upon the appeal to the H. L. I have referred to those cases because the facts are much more fully stated in them. The report in 2 Vern. states that the Lord Keeper held "that the devise to the testator's wife being in the same clause in which she was named executrix, and not said free and exempt from payment of debts, she must therefore take it as executrix, and the same must be applied to the payment of debts." But the question whether the testator's personal estate was exonerated by virtue of the deed which he had executed conveying real estate to trustees on trust for the payment of his debts, was raised by the cases both of the appellant and of the respondents in the H. L. . . . It is to be observed that not a word is said . . . about the wife taking the personal estate as executrix. The report in 2 Vern. states that which does not appear in the recital of the deed in the decree—that the trust was for the payment of the testator's "debts, legacies, and funerals." Consequently, the deed in that case contained all the words which are contained in the deed in the present case. The nature of the deed appears from the recital of it in the original decree. It appears that by that deed provision was made for the payment of the testator's debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, out of the trust property, and it was only subject to that payment that the surplus was given over to the beneficiaries—just as in the present case the surplus is given over to the testator's two sons. I find it impossible, therefore, so far to discover any distinction between the two cases; and, if I had any doubt about the correctness of the decision, and there was nothing else in the present case, I should feel myself bound by French v. Chichester, which is a decision of the highest tribunal, to hold that the personal estate of the testator in the present case is not exonerated from the payment of his debts—p. 680.

JESSEL, M.R.—I do not intend to go through the cases which have been cited. I have done so to a very considerable extent in . . . Leonino v. Leonino, but I will say this, that they are no further a guide to another tribunal in deciding a case upon this subject than any cases of construction are a guide to a Court of construction on another instrument, that is to say, they help the Court in considering what the true meaning of words and phrases may be, but lay down no absolute rule which prevents the Court of construction arriving at its own conclusion from the words used, irrespective of the actual authority of the decided cases, not ignoring decisions upon the same instrument or on the same words—p 223 JAMES, J., concurring.

COTTON, L.J.—Re (Margus) v. Chynghams was much relied upon by the appellants. No doubt the use of the word "collateral" in that case in a series of instruments relating to the property was held by Lord Eldon to mean that the result of the whole transaction was that one property was not to be called upon to provide for payment of part of the debt; but when it was said there in argument that "collateral" did not mean "secondary," so as to make the other the primary security, Lord Eldon did not lay down any rule saying that that was the meaning of the word. He expressly refused to do so, and went upon the whole of the subsequent transactions, as well as the transactions relating to the creation of the particular security, in determining, as he did, that the freehold estate in that case was to bear the whole of the mortgage, and that no part of it was to be thrown upon the collaterals. So that that case, as it seems to me, cannot be referred to as any authority for the purpose of showing that "collateral" security means "secondary" as regards another security for the same debt. Lipcomb v. Lipcomb and De Wertheim v. Davies do not establish the proposition that where there is a further security at a subsequent time, without anything more, it is to be considered as secondary as between the different persons claiming the two properties from the mortgagee. In each of those cases the judges came to the conclusion, as matter of construction, that, as regards the original debt—for there was an additional debt in both cases—the estate originally mortgaged was primarily charged. In neither of the cases was it laid down as a general proposition that, when a security is given and there is at a subsequent period a further security, as between the parties claiming the two estates, one is considered as the primary and the other the secondary security—p 223.

JESSEL, M.R.—It has been enacted that a general devise for payment of debts out of personal estate shall not be deemed to exonerate mortgaged properties, and what is there in this case to take it out of the general rule? If I were to decide otherwise, I should have to hold that every devise of a life interest in real estate was an expression of a contrary intention. It does not appear to me that Locke King's Act was intended to apply as between specific and residuary devises in the way it was held to apply in Brownson v. Lawrence—p 155.

NORTH, J.—Brownson v. Lawrence is inconsistent with the decision of Chelmsford, L. C., in Peacock v. Fyfe (supra, ed. 1093), and with that of Mahon, V.-C., in Gibbins v. Byden (supra, ed. 1093), in which case the V.-C. pointed out that Lord Romilly had, in Brownson v. Lawrence, overlooked Heuguenin v. Fyfe, which decided that a residuary devise is still specific. I cannot follow Brownson v. Lawrence without departing from the decision of Jessel, M. R., in Sackville v. Smyth. I am unable to find anything else in the will to take the case out of the general rule except the words "absolutely to do with as she thinks proper." But that is no more than a gift to the widow in fee, it does not say that she is not to take the house subject to its proportion of the mortgage debt. It would come to this that every devise of an absolute interest in real property would be an expression of a "contingent or other intention." I cannot follow Brownson v. Lawrence. I prefer to follow the later decisions—p. 911.

That has been the law for a long time, and I have no doubt that it has been acted upon in many cases. Moreover looking at the Act, I must say that I myself should, in the absence of that decision, have taken the same view. I desire, therefore, that it be understood, not only that I follow the decision of the M. R. in Solomon v. Solomon, but that I construe the Act in the same manner as he did—p. 666.

HALSBURY, L. C.—There remains another point which has been argued before us with great ingenuity by Mr. Stirling. I must admit in his favour that I do not see how Brown v. Greenbridge, to which he has referred, could have been decided or argued as it was without the point that he has impressed upon us being before the mind of the Court—but I must say that the decision has not passed at present into such a condition of authority that we cannot venture to differ from it. It is admitted that if the personal estate is directed to be exonerated out of the real estate the exoneration ceases so far as regards any personal estate which becomes undistributed. Why should not the same rule apply to a direction to exonerate the general personal estate out of a particular fund of personality? I can see no reason for a distinction between the two cases. The text-books are silent upon any such distinction. Brown v. Greenbridge has not been referred to as supporting it, and so far as I know the distinction between personality and realty in that respect has never since been discussed. I am therefore not disposed to be bound by that case so as to establish what appears to me an arbitrary and unreasonable distinction—p. 63.

LINDLEY, L. J.—There is another point as regards the leaseholds. Mr. Stirling contends that where a fund of personality is set apart to exonerate the general personal estate it is to be applied in exonerating leased gifts, as well as those which take effect, and he refers to Brown v. Greenbridge, which he contends has decided that point in his favour. It would seem that the Court must have so decided, but I am very much struck with the fact that it does not seem to have been treated as settling the law on this point. I cannot find any trace of it in any text-book, and I cannot see upon what rational principle such a distinction between personal estate and real estate can be drawn. It seems to me, therefore, that it is open for us to say that even if the Court did in that case decide the point, it never has become part of the law—p. 64.

FRY, L. J.—Upon the second point I conceive that the general rule of law is that which was laid down by Kindersley, V.-C., in Dacre v. Patricksan. He says there, "It is a general rule, in the absence of any expression of intention to the contrary, that if a testator charges real estate with payment of debts in exoneration of his personal estate, and bequeaths the personal estate to particular individuals, he is held to have intended to exonerate his personal estate for the benefit only of those legatees, and the legatees, if the bequest of the personal estate fails, whether by the death of the legatee in the lifetime of the testator, or by reason of the Statute of Mortmain, so that the personal estate goes to other persons than those intended by the testator, those persons are not entitled to the benefit of the exoneration." That enunciation of the rule no doubt applies to cases where there is a conflict between real estate and personal estate, but in my view it is only a branch of the more general principle—that where the gift to the person intended to be benefited by the exoneration fails, the exoneration itself fails, the right to the benefit of the exoneration being in fact a part of the legacy which fails. That principle applies in my mind whether the property dealt with be realty or personality, and I think we should be wrong if we drew a distinction between them on the ground of a doubtful case in which the point appears never really to have been insisted upon and was not dealt with in the judgment—p. 66.

KINDENSLKY, V.-C.—I do not see any reason to put on the same footing calls made after the testator's death which are necessary, not for constituting the testator a complete shareholder but for rendering the undertaking itself a working concern. Having regard to the cases, I cannot help thinking that if the learned judge who decided Jaques v. Chambers had not thought himself bound by Blount v. Hopkins and Barry v. Harding (supra), he would not have arrived at the conclusion that he did arrive at. I think the M R in Armstrong v. Barnett felt some difficulty in reconciling the decision in that case with that which he felt to be the just principle, and upon which he decided Addams v. Perick, namely, that the question depends entirely upon this, whether the call was made before or after the testator's death.—p. 365

COTTON, L.J.—Now if an executor pays the money to the residuary legatee with knowledge of a debt, and he is afterwards obliged to pay that debt, he no doubt, cannot call on the residuary legatee to refund. It is said that here there was notice of a debt. But there was no debt until a call was made. There was only a liability which might become a debt. In Jervis v. Wolfenstean it was held by Sir G. Jessel, M.R. that notice of liability when the executor pays over a residue, does not take away his right to make the residuary legatee refund if it afterwards becomes a debt. It is true that the M.R. speaks of the "shadowy nature of the liability in that case; but he does not proceed on that, he goes on the principle that notice of a mere liability is not enough, there must be notice of a debt.—p. 11

LORDS MELBORNE, BLACKBURN and WATSON all followed Garland, Ex parte. LORD BLACKBURN further said in Jervis v. Walferton [supra, col. 1103] the M.R. goes so far as to say, "I take it to be a general rule that where persons accept at the request of another, and that other is a cestui que trust, he is personally liable to indemnify the trustees for any loss accruing in the due execution of the trust." Perhaps this rule is too broadly stated, as something must depend on the nature of the trust and of the interest of the cestui que trust, but it is not necessary now to say more than that this rule has no application to a case where the maker of the trust is not a cestui que trust. . . (p. 872). The extent of the right which trustees have to be indemnified, and the manner in which creditors can by equity work it for their own benefit, were discussed by the M.R. in Johnson, In re (supra). The M.R. there says what Garland, Ex parte decides is "that the claim of the creditors is limited to the assets devoted to trade."—p. 875.

MELBORNE, L.C.—On this settlement it is clear that it was intended that the asylum should be carried on by Dr. Sebben and not by the trustees; and that if he did not carry it on it should be sold with the goodwill. It is, therefore, impossible to compare the case with Garland, Ex parte, and Johnson, In re, and the other cases where there has been an express direction by the testator to carry on a business, and where he specially appropriated part of his property for that purpose. Those authorities proceed on this principle, that where a particular part of a trust estate is specifically dedicated to a particular purpose which involves trade debts and liabilities, it is a trust to use it for that particular purpose, and the trustee, though personally liable for the debts which he contracts in the course of the business, has a right to be paid out of the specific assets appropriated for that purpose, and the trade creditors are not to be disappointed of payment so far as the assets so appropriated are concerned. But the authorities tend to limit that doctrine rather than to extend it. Garland, Ex parte, shows that the creditor can only have recourse to the particular part of the property of which there has been such an express dedication; and the right cannot be extended beyond that, either in bankruptcy or in administration. And that applies even to cases in which the trustee has merely done his duty in carrying on the business, and where he may be entitled to an indemnity for the expenses incurred by him.—p. 248. COTTON and FRY, L.J.J. concurred.

LORD HERSCHELL.—With all deference, I am unable to concur in the distinction drawn [by the C.A.] between the assets which come into the hands of the executors at the time of the death of the testator, and property which, in the capacity of executors, they afterwards acquire. Abbott v. Parfitt seems to be a distinct authority that property so acquired is as much assets of the testator as that which was in his possession at the time of his death. It was there held that the price of goods sold to the defendant by the executors, who had carried on their testator's business, no part of the materials of which had belonged to the testator, would, when recovered, be assets of the testator, and I do not think it possible, on principle, to maintain the suggested distinction.—p. 198.

COTTON, L. J.—In Boyes v Bedale the question was on the construction of a bequest in the will of a domiciled Englishman to the children of a person named. The V.-C held that a child exactly in the same position as Hannah Theret was not entitled under the bequest. He said that the will being that of a domiciled Englishman must be construed according to English law, which in my opinion is correct so far as to require that this word "children" shall be construed "legitimate children." But he held that English law recognised as legitimate only those children born in wedlock. This, though correct as regards the children of persons domiciled in England at the time of their birth, is, in my opinion erroneous as to children born of parents who at the time of the birth were domiciled in a country by the law of which the children were legitimate. The V.-C, at the end of his judgment in Boyes v Bedale, expressed his opinion that any claim under the Statute of Distributions would be dealt with in the same way. There is, therefore, a conflict of decisions and, in my opinion, the decision in Boyes v Bedale is contrary to principle, and erroneous—pp. 265, 296

ROMER, J.—Since Harman v Harman it has been considered settled law that an executor who pays creditors without notice of the existence of a creditor of higher degree is not liable to account for the sums so paid at the instance of that creditor. . . . The plaintiffs referred to Blake v Gale, where executors who were also some of the residuary legatees and had retained their own share of the residue were at the instance of creditors made liable to account for the share of residue retained by them as being still in their hands. But that case is quite distinguishable. A legatee is a volunteer, and assets paid to him may be followed by a creditor. A creditor is not a volunteer, and a creditor of higher degree has no right because of that position only to follow assets in the hand of an executor paid to or retained by him in the discharge of his own debt.—p. 621

Patridge v Court (1818) 5 Price 412.

GRAHAM, B.—On consideration I cannot but think that Chambre, J., in Hosier v. Arundell (Lord), carried his opinion too far in putting a promissory note on the same footing, in a question of this nature, as a bond. In that case where a bond was given to the executor in his own name, I think the judgment right, because such a specialty would have the effect of annihilating the previous debt, creating a new and personal obligation of a higher nature, and, therefore, I am obliged to say with deference that I cannot hold the opinion of Chambre, J. to be right, in putting a promissory note on the same footing as a bond.—p. 419.

WOOD, B.—But I consider that case [Betts v Mitchell] to have been since properly overruled by subsequent decisions, and on very good grounds.—p. 421.

GARROW, B.—King v Thom (post) has overruled Betts v Mitchell.—p. 423.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J.—If it had been alleged that they sued as executors, &c., that would have been enough to have raised the other question, whether a count, upon promises, on an account stated with one as executor, can be joined with other counts on promises with the testator upon which there are authorities both ways. The cases in favour of the proposition are Bull v. Palmer and Mason v Jackson, together with the opinion of Buller, J. in the cases cited (King v Thom and Cockerill v. Kynaston), that wherever the sum recovered by the executor on promises to himself would be assets in his hands, there the count may be joined with counts on promises made to the testator. But there are many authorities the other way; and I think you will hardly find the point tenable.—p. 154.

BLACKBURN, J—The later cases have—as PAKE, B says in the passage cited from Heath v Chilton—conclusively settled that an executor has the option to sue in his representative character on contracts made with himself, where the money, when recovered, would be assets (though in a great many such cases he might use in his personal capacity), and he adds that that rule ought not to be disturbed, in this I fully agree. When the executor is acting in conformity with the directions of the will, there can be no doubt in what character they are acting but it sometimes happens—and that is what often raises a difficulty—that the executor or administrator is also beneficially interested as legatee or next of kin, and as soon as he has assumed to take, then the benefit would be no longer assets, and, on the other hand—as, for instance, in the case of a lease—he becomes personally responsible for any burthens attached to the subject-matter.

And the question therefore sometimes might be, in what character was the business being carried on by the executor or administrator.
Bolingbroke v Kerr by losing sight of this distinction, Bolingbroke v Kerr may very probably have been misunderstood. There the intestate died leaving a daughter, a minor, who, however, afterwards took out administration, probably, therefore, she was an only child and sole next of kin; she married, and she and her husband carried on the business for more than two years; the business was carried on with money which the wife had received from the intestate's estate—probably therefore with the wife's fortune, but it is hardly likely that they were carrying it on for such a length of time for the benefit of the estate.
 It is much more likely that it was carried on, though, in point of fact, by the administratrix, yet by the administratrix after having assented to take it as next of kin and so as belonging to her, in which case the husband ought clearly to have sued alone. So understood, the case would be in perfect conformity with the decided cases. In the Law Journal, it is true, it is said that the administratrix and her husband carried on the business for the benefit of the deceased's estate, but in the Law Reports there is no such statement, and I cannot but think that there must be a mistake in the Law Journal. For if that really had been found as a fact, the decision must have overruled very numerous cases on the subject, or the Court must have distinguished them in some way which I cannot understand; and it is incredible that the Court should have done this sub silentio.
 The facts in the Law Reports leave the case consistent with previous cases, and the report is probably right. And the Law Journal must have misapprehended what was the evidence upon which the point was reserved.—p. 349

HANNEN, J, who also concurred, said. In Moseley v Rendell I rested my judgment on the fact that the materials employed belonged decision of that case, and it was unnecessary to consider Bolingbroke v Kerr—p. 351

DENMAN, J—In Williams on Executors (7th ed. vol. i. p. 798), a work in itself of great authority, all the cases on the subject are commented upon, and the law is stated entirely in accordance with the dictum of Richardson, J in Knights v. Quarles. It is distinctly laid down that an executor may recover damages to the personal estate arising out of a contract, though an action of tort might have been brought for the personal injury, resulting from the same act of the defendant, before the death of the testator.
Alton v. Midland Ry. [(1864) 34 L J C P 292; 19 C. B. (N.S.) 218. See "CARRIERS," col. 245] is also referred to in a note, and it is clear that the learned author, who was a judge of this Court when that case was decided, looked upon the dictum of Willes, J in that case as a confirmation of the opinion of Richardson, J in Knights v Quarles.
 He proceeds, however, to say that the rule there laid down must be taken to be limited by a qualification introduced by the modern decision of Chamberlain v. Williamson, viz., that an action by the executor for breach of contract will not lie where the damage is purely personal, and there is no damage to the estate. In that case the action was for breach of promise of marriage, and the decision turns distinctly on the ground that there was no special damage stated on the record, and so the executor could not have an action because the only damages recoverable were purely personal.
 Here, the damages are not personal in their nature, but are damages to the estate, the case falls, therefore, within the rule as laid down by Sir E. V. Williams, and not the exception. Again, Potter v. Metropolitan Ry. though not exactly in point, is to some extent an authority in favour of the view we take. In one respect it was a stronger case, for it was doubtful there whether the declaration was in contract, whereas it clearly is so here. There the wife was the person to whom the injury was done, and she sued as executrix to her husband, who had died, in respect of the damage to the personal estate. The case was not, therefore, one of personal injury ultimately causing death, and consequently is not on all fours with the present. The principle, however, of the decision is quite consistent with our judgment in this case.—p 194.

MELLOR, J.—With the single exception, so far as I am aware, of . . . *Bradshaw v. But as that case has been decided on the very point, I entirely yield to the authority of the decision, so far as to say that in this Court it cannot be questioned, and we must therefore abide by it. I must say, however, that we yield to it for the purposes of this case, and that, at all events, if it is to be questioned, it must be questioned in a C. A.—p 605

LENDLEY, L.J.—The decision . . . appears to me to be substantially correct, subject to one qualification. Care must be taken not to give countenance to the notion that by seeking out an infant plaintiff who may be a residuary legatee, or interested, perhaps, in a very small portion of the estate, an administration judgment may be obtained at the expense of the estate as a matter of course as it used to be obtained. I hope that state of things is gone, and gone for ever. It was one of the greatest scandals of the profession. It is struck at, and I hope most effectively, by means of Ord. LV., and especially by Ord. LXX. as to costs, since, subject to a reservation made by the latter rule with regard to the right of executors and trustees and mortgages as to costs, the costs of administration actions, whether insisted by next friends of infants or by any one else, are in the discretion of the Court, and, being in the discretion of the Court, the Court will deal with them in a proper manner. Thus, if it finds (as for anything I know, it may be found here) that these modified inquiries which we think ought to be made are really unnecessary. Kay, J. can make the next friend of the infant and the other plaintiff pay all the costs, including the costs of the appeal.—p. 918.

JESSEL, M. R.—It is said that it was decided . . . in Woodridge v. Norris that it was unnecessary to file a bill on behalf of all the creditors in order to obtain administration of the real estate; but it does not appear to me that he [the V.-C.] did so decide. In the first place, there was in that case (as the V.-C. observed in his judgment) an express trust in the testator's will to pay the debt, and in the next place it was a decision on a demurrer, and all that the V.-C. said was that he would not in any case have allowed the objection to prevail, which may have meant that he would have given liberty to stand. On the other hand, in Esquivel v. Hartley, Lord Hatherley, when V.-C., allowed a demurrer to a bill by a creditor for administration of real estate, on the ground that the suit was not on behalf of all creditors. It seems to me, therefore, that the old practice was clearly established; and, to my regret, I find nothing in the new rules to alter it. The good sense of the matter is entirely in accordance with the view of Hall, V.-C. in Cowper v. Blissett, but the rule is express, that, where no other provision is made by the orders, the old procedure and practice remain. The writ had better be amended by making the plaintiff sue on behalf of himself and all other creditors.—p. 110.

WORTH, J.—I think it must have been stated in the title of the statement of claim in that case that the plaintiff was suing on behalf of all the other creditors. I think that the reference there to the action being entitled "In the matter of the estate" shows that the matter with which the M. R. was dealing was the title of the action. The whole judgment deals only, I think, with the title of the action, and the reason why he considered it unnecessary that the writ should be amended was because the title of the statement of claim showed that the plaintiff was suing in a representative capacity.—p. 550.

ROMER, L. J.—That case [Hopkins, in re] to my mind is clearly distinguishable and does not apply to the present case. Under the Bankruptcy Act and Rules applying at that time, the creditor who in that case wished to come in and change his proof could not have amended his proof in bankruptcy, and would not have been allowed to do so; and when he came in and was obliged to confess that, in bankruptcy, he could not have been allowed to change his proof, he was met by the unanswerable objection in Chancery, "Whom is your special circumstance? There is no special circumstance, and the Bankruptcy Rules are against you"; and accordingly it was held that, not being allowed to change his proof in bankruptcy, there were no special circumstances entitling the Court to allow him to vary the certificate or alter his proof in Chancery. That is the whole case—p. 699.

(for self and JAMES, L.J.)—In some of the cases cited, and which have been much relied upon, as for instance, in Williamson v. Naylor, it will be found that the Court simply made a decree or order for carrying into execution certain trusts for the benefit of creditors, and, having directed an inquiry as to who were entitled to the trust funds, eventually made an order for payment to the persons whose titles were certified. There was not in any of these cases any general administration decree operating as a judgment in favour of the creditors. Again, the facts of Wild v. Banning hardly support the marginal note, for though the M.R. intimated an opinion that the creditors who ultimately established their claims would be entitled to divide the funds, he only decided that the trustee was not entitled to the unreserved funds, and he directed an inquiry as to who were entitled to them. But, whilst the orders relied upon by the appellants fail to show any lengthened uniform practice in the direction contended for by them, Alderson v. Petrie singularly illustrates the course, which, in our opinion, ought to be adopted in like cases.

The principle upon which that decision was based is, in our judgment, unimpeachably sound, and we must act on the same principle in the case before us—pp. 328–330.

STIRLING, J.—It was there held that, in the administration by the Court of the assets of a deceased person the claim of a woman for money lent to her husband for the purposes of his trade or business was, by the combined effect of sect. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1876, postponed to the claims of his other creditors. This case seems to me to be decided on the principle (expressly stated by the present M.R. in his judgment) that "the rules in bankruptcy as to debts and liabilities, provable must now, I think, include all rules as to priorities expressly enacted by any statute and made applicable in the event of bankruptcy." It is contended on behalf of the creditors for rates that this principle ought to be applied in the present case. It is said that sect. 3 [of the Preferential Payments Act, 1885] expressly limits the operation of the Act to receiving orders, orders made under sect. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act and the winding-up of companies. Sect. 3 appears to me to provide that not every administration in bankruptcy or winding-up is to be affected by the Act, but only those where an order has been made after the period fixed for the commencement of the Act. I do not think it was meant to exclude the application of sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875. . . I have the less difficulty in arriving at this conclusion that it agrees with the opinion expressed by the present M.R. in Leng, In re. . . It is true that his lordship does not make any reference to sect. 3, but it seems most improbable that this section should have been overlooked. —p. 27.

ROMER, L.J.—Maggs, In re, can, I think, no longer be regarded as an authority. The attention of Fry, J., when he decided that case, was not directed to, and he did not in his judgment deal with, those words of sect. 10 which formed the basis of the decision in Leng, In re, and which form the basis of our present decision.—p. 8.

JESSEL, M.R.—But for two recent decisions of Malins, V.-C., I should have thought that that question [whether a Court can administer an estate without having before it the legal personal representative of the testator or intestate, where an executor de son tort or the legal personal representative of such an executor is before the Court] was unarguable. I have always supposed that this Court could not make a decree for general administration in the absence of the legal personal representative. In Rayner
v. Koehler, the first of his two decisions, Malins, V.-C. decided the contrary, but he did not go into the subject very fully, nor perhaps very carefully. Then followed Cary v. Hills, in which my predecessor, Lord Romilly, declined to follow Rayner v. Koehler. Then came Coote
v. Whittington, the second of the two cases, and in it unquestionably the V.-C. did examine the subject with the greatest minuteness and care.
I have read his judgment most carefully, but am unable to follow his reasoning, or to agree with his conclusion. I should not, however, have ventured to express so strongly my dissent from the V.-C., had not my attention been called to two decisions which are in opposition to his, one by Lord Cottenham, Penny v. Watts, which is binding upon me, and the other by Lord Hardley, Beardmore v. Gregory, which is not absolutely binding, but is of equal authority with the decisions of Malins, V.-C., and I should prefer to follow it in a case where difference of opinion exists. Such being the state of the authorities, I must hold the law of the Court to be, that a suit for administration is defective when the legal personal representative is not before the Court.—p. 22.

MALINS, V.-C.—I am aware that Coote v.
Whittington was subjected to criticism by Sir G. Jessel in Rowse v. Morris, and I think, in answer to the observations made by him, I may say that he expressed himself somewhat incautiously, for he decides that you cannot administer an estate in this Court without having before it the legal personal representative of the testator or intestate, although an executor de son tort or the legal personal representative of such an executor is before the Court. If, as he says, you cannot sue a person as executor de son tort, then any person may enter upon and take possession of the property of a deceased, and he cannot be sued for doing so. I know of no character in which such a man can be sued, except it is that of an executor de son tort, as I pointed out in Coote v. Whittington. It would be the height of injustice if a man could possess himself of the assets of a testator, and because he did not choose to clothe himself with the character of administrator, could not therefore be sued in respect of such assets. I have already decided the contrary, first in Rayner v. Koehler (supra), and then in Coote v. Whittington, and I believe that what I decided in those cases has been the rule ever since the statute of Elizabeth.—p. 305.

HALE, V.-C.—Bowsher v. Watkins has been frequently cited, and there is apparently in the report of the judgment, which is very short, some ground for saying that an opinion was there expressed by the M. R. which might warrant the general proposition that in every case where there is a refusal to sue, a residuary legatee might himself sue the alleged debtor—the alleged debtor in that case, as in many others, being a surviving partner. But that case has, as was stated during the argument, been commented upon on several occasions, and suffice it to say, in Darvex v. Davies (supra) and in Wright v. Hamilton (supra), it is stated by the judges who decided those cases that there were special circumstances in Bowsher v. Watkins which accounted for the view that was taken by the Court; therefore it is not to be considered an authority establishing that a mere refusal to sue is sufficient to entitle a residuary legatee to institute an action against the debtor to the estate. I agree therefore, with what was said by the defendant's counsel here, that that case had better never be referred to again as supporting any such general proposition. [His lordship then discussed Lauderdale v. Elory, Tavia v. Milar and Stedman v. Crenshaw, and continued.] In Hilliard v. Esff there is a judgment given of the V.-C. of Ireland, in which he says (L. R. 7 H. L. 44, n.)—"The rule now appears to be subject to the exception of the occasional, or, in some cases, the usual, insolvency of the personal representatives, or refusal by them to sue, whether collusively or bona fide, on the existence of what has been rather vaguely termed 'special circumstances.'" I do not, however, consider that the V.-C. in that case had down, or meant to lay down, any such rule as that mere refusal to sue would in any case be sufficient without the Court taking into consideration the circumstances of the particular case, and I cannot treat it as an authority of the V.-C. for such a proposition. But if his statement of the rule is to be construed and read otherwise, I must say I respectfully dissent from it, and I think that it is at variance with the other authorities to which I have been referred,—pp. 214, 215

JESSAIL, M. R.—Roberts v. Roberts was a case of great singularity. Now, speaking with all deference to Lord Cottenham, who decided that case, there are portions of his judgment I am unable to follow. The testator gave his residuary personal estate to his three daughters, who were his only children, with an ultimate trust, "in the event of their all dying under twenty-one, and without having been married, for those who would then be entitled under the Statute of Distribution." The testator's widow was joined as co-plaintiff in a suit for the administration of the estate, and a general demurrer was put in on the ground of misjoinder, it being contended that the widow has not such an interest as entitles her to be a party. It was held that she was a proper party, but for a reason I cannot understand. If it had been said that she was at present actually entitled to a portion of the testator's personal estate I could have understood the decision. She had no doubt an interest as well as the next-of-kin at the testator's death, but subject to its being defeated. But that was not the ground of the decision. The ground upon which I feel a difficulty is this, that Lord Cottenham makes a distinction between the widow and the next-of-kin. He says, "There is a great difference between the widow and the next-of-kin. The next-of-kin are unascertained. The widow is no part of a class, but entitled in her own individual right, if she dies she loses her right." Now, the gift was a class to be ascertained at a future time, and the widow was not at present a member of that class. She might have been if she had lived so long, so might the testator's present next-of-kin if they had lived so long. It seems to me therefore, that the distinction which Lord Cottenham makes was not a sufficient answer to the question. He says in his judgment, "Now, even assuming the appellant's construction of the will to be correct, the widow is already contingently entitled to a share of the testator's estate in the event of her surviving her children, and their all dying under twenty-one and unmarried. Nothing can prevent her taking an share but her dying before the period arrives at which the interest of the daughters ceases. She is no part of a class, but has a separate and individual right to a portion of her husband's property not disposed of." Now, if Lord Cottenham means that as the widow takes a share now, and therefore will be entitled even if the contingent class fails, I can understand his decision. It is clear that he makes a distinction between the members of the class and the widow, but, with great deference, I see no such distinction. The gift is to a class of persons of whom the widow may or may not be one. How can that be such an interest as to enable her to maintain a suit?—p. 418.

COTTON, L.J.—In Clowes v. Hilliard the persons claiming to have an interest were persons who claimed to be next-of-kin under a gift to the testator's next-of-kin, to be ascertained at a period which had not then arrived. Had the time arrived they would have had an interest as members of the class designated, but they had not then. A person who if he lives to a certain time, and no one else comes in to cut off his claim, will become entitled, has only a possibility, and not such an interest as will entitle him to maintain an action. I think that Clowes v. Hilliard is no authority for the proposition for which it was cited. Nor was Duress v. Angel, because there, there was a gift of a share of residue to the testator's nephew for his life, conditional on his marrying a certain lady, with remainder for his eldest or any child which should attain twenty-one years. During the life of the testator, and apparently with his consent, the nephew married another lady. The testator never altered his will, but the nephew's son, in spite of his father's having made this marriage, brought an action, contending that as it was possible that his father might, after the death of his mother marry the lady named by the testator, he, the son, had still an interest in the fund. Neither of these cases applies here, the plaintiff has an actual interest, and one which may very possibly arise.—p 745. BOWEN and FRY, L.J. concurred.

LITTLEDALE, J.—I was not present at the decision of Foster v. Blakelock; the point, in that case, regarding the effect of a prolate stamp, as prima facie evidence of assets, does not seem to have been much considered, and the stamp in such a case is less conclusive, as the Stamp Act [56 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 38] requires the whole value of the estate and effects to be sworn to, without deducting anything on account of debts due from the deceased.—p 663.

PARKER, J.—No doubt it was rightly held, in Crosse v. Smith, that an executor, having received assets, cannot discharge himself by paying the money over to his co-executor. Here, however, the presumption of such receipt is not raised, but, on the contrary, rebutted by the evidence. The point referred to as decided in Foster v. Blakelock does not appear to have undergone much discussion there, and I cannot concur in that decision.—p 663.

JESSE, M.R.—I will here say a word upon Job v. Job, which was recently before me, and which I understand has led to some misapprehension. I there said that in administration actions an order charging an executor with wilful default may be made at any time during the progress of the action. Now an order charging an executor with wilful default could not be made unless he was so charged in the pleadings; therefore the charge, unless originally pleaded, must be introduced by amendment—that is, of course, by amendment at any stage of the action at which amendments may be made, that is, before judgment. The general rule is that, in every case an order charging wilful default must be based upon a charge of wilful default in the pleadings. There has, however, been always one exception to that rule, namely, in the case of a mortgage in possession. You always make a decree against him of wilful default in respect of rents and profits, though no charge of wilful default has been made in the pleadings, and there has been no proof of it at the trial. That is the exception to the general rule. On what principle does that exception depend? Now, upon that one may refer to the books to see what is the extent of the exception to the general rule, and, secondly, what is the supposed reason on which the exception is founded. One reason, perhaps, formerly was that the Court looked with less favour on a mortgagee, who, though a trustee, derives a benefit from his trust, than on ordinary or genuine trustees, who accept no remuneration for their duties. I will first of all refer to the text books. On referring to Mr Fisher's very learned book on mortgages, I find he says this (8th ed. vol. ii. p. 943): "The account usually directed against the mortgagee in possession, either of tangible property or of a business, is of what he has, or without wilful default might have received from the time of his taking possession." . . . Mr. Fisher's statement of the rule is quite general, and would, in my opinion, be sufficient to decide the case, even if it stood alone, but there are two authorities which seem to me to be conclusive on the point.—p. 426.

 HALL, V.-C. said he could not regard Miles v. Harrison (supra) otherwise than as an authority that the costs of an administration suit were included in the words "testamentary expenses." The headnote to the report of that case in the Law Reports was imperfect, and, looking at the note only, one wondered how the argument arose. The main question was as to the marshalling of assets in favour of charities, but still other questions arose, including that of costs. As to the other authorities, the late M.R., in Gilbertson v. Gilbertson, and Stranger v. Harper, considered that "testamentary expenses" did not include the costs of a suit. In Webb v. Beauvoisin, on the other hand, he thought that "testamentary and other expenses" did include costs of suit, though it was not very apparent why the words "and other expenses" should be considered as making a distinction. As to Morrell v. Fisher, he did not think there was a sufficiently substantial distinction between that case and the present. The decision in Brief's Estate, In re, depended on particular circumstances and on the form of a codicil, and did not affect the general question.—p. 513.

MALINS, V.-C., after considering Eyre v. Marsden, said:—This decision evidently proceeded on the grounds of the charge of debts and costs contained in the will. . . . Now, with regard to that case [Maddison v. Fye], I must say that I think it is a pity that cases which are to be reported at all should be reported as that was. The particular form of the will is not given, and there are no arguments, or even the name of the counsel engaged, and not a single authority is stated to have been cited. There is nothing to show whether the estate was charged with debts or legacies. Somebody must have told Mr. Beavan that such a case had occurred when he himself was not in Court. The rule is thus laid down, and evidently incorrectly:—"Eyre v. Marsden (4 Myl & Cr. 281) settles this. Where a real estate is disposed of in favour of several persons, and the suit is solely for the administration of the real estate, and some of the shares lapse, these shares are not to be made to bear the costs of the suit, but the costs are to be borne by the real estate"—which was not done in Eyre v. Marsden—"generally, and the heir-at-law's estate is not to bear all the costs." Further on, the M.R. says, "I have always understood the rule to be this: in suits for the administration of the personal estate the part of it undisposed of is first applicable to the payment of the costs, but the rule is different as to real estate. There the heir-at-law is only charged with his proportion of the costs of the suit." The rule as thus laid down is entirely erroneous, and I cannot believe that the M.R. ever stated it in those broad terms; and if he did, I can only say it is impossible that I can follow it.—p. 584.

HALL, V.-C.—Notwithstanding the decision in Bagot v. Legge, I think that in this case the residuary personal estate must bear the costs so far as it will go. With regard to the mode of bearing the deficiency, the authorities are in an unsatisfactory state, and not easily reconcilable with one another. On this point I shall follow *Bagot v. JESSEL, M.R.—I am sorry that I must entirely differ from the learned V.-C. Malins in the conclusion he has come to as to the state of the law respecting the incidence of costs of administration suits as between a share of residue well bequeathed and another share of residue which has lapsed and therefore devolved upon the next of kin. It appears to have been long settled law that there is no residue of personal estate until after payment of the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and all costs of the administration of the estate of the testator. Therefore, until you have paid the costs, you do not arrive at the net residue at all, and when you do arrive at it, it is distributed according to law. That is the principle.—p. 56

MALINS, V.-C.—No one can doubt that the residuary personal estate is primarily the fund for payment of the costs of administration, and all that I intended to decide in Gowan v Broughton [in which his lordship had applied the rule in Scott v Cumberland to a lapsed share of residuary estate] was, that where the residuary personality is given to a person who dies in the lifetime of the testator, such personality is no less the primary fund for payment of the costs than it would have been if the legatee had survived. [His lordship then referred to Trethewy v Holyar and Penton v Wills, and pointed out that the decision in those cases was in accordance with his decision in the cases before him.]—p. 11.

PEARSON, J.—A great number of cases have been cited, amongst others, Scott v Cumberland and Gowan v Broughton. I should very much regret if I were compelled to sit in judgment upon those two cases. I say this from personal motives, because I happened to be counsel in both of them, and I know that I was very much dissatisfied with the decisions in both those cases, and I should, therefore, distrust myself exceedingly in expressing an opinion upon those cases, either for them or against them, unless I had so long a period of tranquillity in which to consider them that I could be perfectly satisfied I had come to a conclusion without being influenced by that which I know was weighing upon me at the time when they were decided. But I am not going to express any opinion on either of those cases, or any other cases. To my mind, the present case is not like either Scott v Cumberland or Gowan v Broughton. It is, no doubt, far more like Row v Row but I do not think it is even quite analogous to Row v Row. In

Row v Row there was a devise in the will which was so obscure and so uncertain that it was impossible to affix any meaning to it, and the Court determined that the will must be read as if that devise had not been contained in it. The result was, that so reading the will and striking the devise out of it, there was no devise whatever of the property, which the V.-C. held to be applicable to the payment of the costs.—p. 169.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now I should have felt no doubt at all upon the point had it not been for Reece's Estate, In re. Looking at that case, I may observe, in the first place, that the headnote itself is right. The note is this:—"In administration suits, where the gross value of the estate to be administered amounts to £1,000 at the time of the institution of the suit, the higher scale of costs applies." There the suit was a creditor's suit for the administration of a testator's estate subject to a mortgage; therefore what was sought to be administered was what he had, namely, his equity of redemption. In taxing the costs the taxing master had taxed according to the lower scale, and a summons was taken out by both plaintiff and defendant for the purpose of having the costs allowed on the higher scale. Now comes the remarkable part of the case. The same firm of solicitors appeared for both the plaintiff and defendant; both counsel argued the same way, and the only point submitted to Lord Romilly was that the lower scale referred to the gross value at the time of the institution of the suit, and not to the ultimate net value after deducting payments made after the suit had been instituted. But the real difficulty in the case was not brought to Lord Romilly's attention at all, and accordingly he passes it over in his judgment. He says: "I am of opinion that the lower scale applies where the gross value of the estate to be administered is below £1,000 at the time when the suit is instituted and not where the net value is below that amount." Now I entirely agree that you are to have regard to the gross value of the estate which is to be administered, but Lord Romilly does not say how you are to apply the rule when the estate to be administered is an equity of redemption only. A man may have property worth £100,000, but if it is in mortgage, all he has actually belonging to him, that is, all that can be administered as his estate, is the equity of redemption, which may be almost valueless. How, then, could you say his estate was worth £100,000? Lord Romilly never did decide this point, and his attention was not called to it. That case therefore cannot be considered an authority, and I shall not follow it. The rule is rightly laid down in the judgment, though it is wrongly applied to the facts.—p. 179.

FRY, J.—In Morgan on Costs, p. 117, it is stated that the decision in Sanders v. Miller is contrary to the current of authority. In Sanders v. Miller the M.R. apportioned the costs, but I cannot help thinking that, in that case, his honour proceeded upon the mistaken impression that there was a trust for conversion. Whether that be so or not, that case is contrary to the current of authority.—p. 526. [Varied, post]

GRIFFITH, J., after discussing Samuel v. Jones, Gibbons v. Hawley, Baeyer v. Griffin and Smith v. Dale, said—I now come to the two last decisions on the point. The first is that of North, J., in Lewis v. Trask, in which he declined to order payment to a defaulting executor of any costs out of the estate until he had made good his default. This is what he says. "With regard to Baeyer v. Griffin, I shall only follow it to this extent, that the trustee may have his costs after he has paid into Court the sum in which he is in default. Otherwise I do not think that case applies to the present, because there was no money due from the trustee to be paid into Court, whereas in the present case there is a sum due and an order for its payment into Court." He takes the same ground as that on which I have proceeded. Then Hall, V.-C., in Clare v. Clare, decided a few days afterwards, appears to have made inquiries as to Lewis v. Trask, which had not then been reported, and he makes the following statement, which is worthy of observation, because it has been said that the practice was settled. The V.-C. said that the practice did not appear to him to be settled, and then he went on to say that he preferred to follow the decision in Baeyer v. Griffin, "as it seemed to him to be consistent with good sense to hold that any person who, though adjudicated bankrupt, was retained as a party to an action, as executor or trustee, should be paid his costs." I therefore make an order similar to that in Lewis v. Trask.—pp. 208, 204.

JESSEL, M.R.—It seems to me that the principle has been correctly laid down by Kindersley, V.-C. in Thomas v. Jones. Then the point came before James, V.-C. in Burrell, In re, where the costs of the plaintiff, a residuary legatee in a suit for administering an insufficient estate, were allowed as between solicitor and client. Now I am satisfied that the V.-C. did not intend to lay down any general rule. The only authorities that were cited to him were Burkitt v. Ransom (supra) and Weston v. Clowes (supra), and the V.-C. seems to have been unaware that there were any other authorities on the subject, or, at all events, they were not called to his attention. The V.-C. was evidently dealing only with the particular case before him, and I feel satisfied that he did not intend to interfere with the general rule.—p. 613.

CHITTY, J. —The decision in Williams v. Cooke established that a married woman who, with her husband, is entitled to a mortgage debt, has a charge or incumbrance within the meaning of the 77th section (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74) taken in connection with the interpretation clause, but in the present case the point is different. Here, the married woman, together with other beneficiaries, had an interest in the mortgage debt, so that she and her husband together could not have disposed of it, and, moreover, there was another party interested, who was not a party to the deed.—p. 187

—G. A. LINDLEY and SMITH, L.J., KAY, L.J. distinguished, reversing STIRLING, J.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self and SMITH, L.J.) —In Newton's Trusts, In re, CHITTY, J., appears to have decided the exact point which arises in the present case, and to have decided that the reversionary interest of a married woman in money invested by her trustees on mortgage was not within the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act. I confess I have great difficulty in understanding that case. It seems to have turned on the fact that the married woman had a rever-sionary interest in only two-thirds of the mortgage debt, and that the owner of the other third did not join in the assignment. The decision appears to me to be opposed to those which I have mentioned, although, no doubt, it is consistent with Hobbs v. Collins [20 L. J. Ch. 199, 4 De G. & M. 289]. I feel compelled to say that I think Newton's Trusts, In re, was decided on too narrow a view of the Act.—p. 360

KAY, L.J. —In Newton's Trusts, In re, trustees of personal estate invested part of it on mortgage. A married woman was entitled to one-third of the personal estate in reversion after a life estate. She and her husband by a deed in 1854, before Mahan's Act, purported to convict the tenant for life and the other cestui que trust in reversion in assigning the mortgage debts, and all other the personal property, by way of mortgage, and the married woman ac-knowledgeed this deed under the Fines and Recoveries Act, and that the deed was not sufficient to pass the interest of the married woman in the mortgage debts. The learned judge afterwards referred to the non-concurrence of one of the cedens que trust in remainder. I suppose because the other cedens que trust could not alone require a transfer to themselves of the mortgage. But I understand the main reason of the decision to be that what the married woman purported to assign was an equitable interest in a debt secured by mortgage, and not merely an interest in land: within the meaning of those words in the Fines and Recoveries Act.—pp. 362, 363.

ROMILEY, M.R.—In this case, it was held that a married woman could dispose of freeholds settled to her separate use as if she were a feme sole, without an acknowledgment under the statute . . . I have carefully read and considered that case, but am unable to concur with the two learned judges who dissented from and overruled the decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. If the decision had been unanimous, I should not have ventured to differ from it, but as the Lord Chancellor, on reflection, adhered to his previous opinion, the case has not that weight which it would otherwise have possessed. The distinction that the words "separate use," applied only to what the husband would have taken if those words had not been used, does not appear to have been sufficiently presented to the minds of the learned judges who dissented from the Lord Chancellor. I must choose between conflicting decisions, and I am of opinion that on principle, and by the preponderance of authority, it is established, that before the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, a fine was necessary to pass the interest of a married woman in that part of her fee-simple estate which did not belong to her husband, and that since that statute an acknowledgment, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, s. 77, is necessary for that purpose, notwithstanding that the estate of the wife is given for her separate use.—p. 589

HATHERLEY, L.C.—I am quite satisfied, with reference to the Fines and Recoveries Act, that the course of the other vendors in *Crofts v. [Counsel cited Kindersley, V.-C. in In re Hayes.—"He would make the order for payment out on her examination only." This was in fact substituting examination for an acknowledgment by deed.]

JESSEL, M.R.—That cannot possibly be the principle. There must have been some mode before the Fines and Recoveries Act of enabling married women to make their election in such cases (p. 654). The object, therefore, of requiring the married woman to be examined was to enable her to elect whether she would take the money as land or as money. In the case before Kindersley, V.-C., the true reason for examining the wife had evidently been overlooked.—p. 655

JESSEL, M.R.—The difficulty arises from a decision of Chief Justice Tindal in Webster v. Carline. But for that decision I should have thought it too clear for argument that the commissioners for taking acknowledgments appointed under sect. 81 were able, when appointed, to act for any county. The Act does not say they are to be appointed for taking acknowledgments for such county, but they are to be appointed "for every county" to be perpetual commissioners for taking such acknowledgments. I am of opinion that this acknowledgment is valid. With the greatest deference to the Court of Common Pleas, I am unable to find any such restriction as they found in the Act, and I must further suppose that if Chief Justice Bovill had not taken the same view as I do he would not have allowed the certificate to be filed.—p. 301.

COLORIDGE, C.J.—In the case of Re Eady, the affidavit was signed by the judge and not by the deponent, it being contrary to the practice of the Courts in Hamburg that any signature should be attached to an affidavit except that of the judge before whom the oath is administered. The Court however, required that fact to be verified by affidavit, Tindal, C.J. observing that, "to the eye of a person merely looking at the affidavit, the evidence would otherwise appear incomplete." Here we are asked to go a step farther, but it is to be observed that that case occurred before the Rule of Court of Hilary Term, 1836. I am of opinion that, having regard to that case and to the rule, there is enough here to cure the defect —1, 352

That case must have been decided under a misapprehension, for in the Law Journal Reports it is stated that the Court were, I do not say intentionally, but plainly, informed that no parliamentary definition had been given in the statute itself, which was correct as regards the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, but they were not told, through some oversight, that in the Public Health Act, 1848, which was in existence at the time this decision was given, there was such a definition. That definition enacts that "owner" is to be interpreted as "the person for the time being in receipt of the rack rent"—p. 80.

RUSSELL, C.J.—Then comes this provision [in the order of the Board of Trade of July 9th, 1890, constituting the North Eastern Sea Fisheries Committee], which is also important "All the members shall retire, and the new members shall come into office in each year on the 9th day of November." I refer to that because it makes intelligible what at first sight did not seem to me so in some of the observations of the then V. Williams, J. (now V. Williams, L.J.) in the Plymouth Case, where he spoke of the appointment each year of the fishery inspector. It would appear from the constitution of this body that, unlike most similar bodies, as to which the usual provision is that a certain proportion of them retire annually—it seems to be the scheme of the constitution of this body that they shall all retire, being capable of re-election, but that they shall all retire at the end of each year. So that there would seem to be, therefore, a moment of time when the Fisheries Committee did not exist, although its members were capable of being re-elected, or such persons might be elected in their place. Therefore, there does seem to have been ground for the language used by V. Williams, J. in the Plymouth Case, in which he spoke of the reappointment annually of the fishery inspector. Perhaps I ought explicitly to add that if the simile to the headline in the report of the Plymouth Case is rightly attributed to V. Williams, J., I do not agree with it.

WILLS, J.—A tributary is that which contributes, and I cannot understand why a stream of water should be the less a tributary because before it reaches the Severn it falls into another stream which has another name. That this stream is a "tributary" seems to me to be absolutely free from doubt. I can understand the views taken in Harbottle v. Terry, where the Court was dealing with an artificial construction, but in the present case there is nothing of the kind, and it is therefore perfectly distinguishable from that case. It is also distinguishable from the earlier case of Moricks v. Cadwallader, for in that case there were a number of streams which were mentioned as confluent of the Severn, there the general word "tributary" was used, and the Court thought they ought to apply it as being ejusdem generis with the word confluent. It is clear to my mind that the larger language of the present order was adopted in consequence of that decision—p. 230.

Mather v. Fraser (1856) 2 Kay & J 536, 25 L J. Ch 861, 2 Jur. (N.S.) 900; 4 W. R. 387, WOOD, V.C.—This consideration disposes of the decision—I do not say, of the dictum—in Hollawell v. Eastwood. For the decision in that case there was abundant ground, irrespective of the dictum. The tenant had annexed to the freehold property which as between him and his landlord, would have been held, on a determination of the lease, to be chattel property, which the tenant was entitled to remove. The landlord sought to distrain. There would have been a manifest inconsistency in holding such property exempt from distress, on the ground of of cases ending with that of Fisher v. Dixon (12 Cl. & F 312), which does not appear to have been cited in Hollawell v. Eastwood, could not have been present to the mind of the learned judge to whom that dictum is attributed—p 549.

HANNEN, J. (for the Court).—It is observable that Hollawell v. Eastwood was decided before any of the cases to which we have referred (Mather v. Fraser, Walmesley v. Milne (7 C B (N.S.) 115, 29 L J C. P. 97), Cullwick v. Swindell (L R. 3 Eq. 249), Olimie v. Wood (L R. 3 Ex. 257, L R. & Ex. 328)), and was cited in all or most of them, but not followed in any. On the contrary, it was distinguished in Mather v. Fraser by the present Lord Chancellor (Hatherley), then Vice-Chancellor, who observed that it was a case between landlord and tenant, and was altogether inapplicable to the question whether machines fixed by an owner of the soil passed to a mortgagee of the freehold. In that case machinery fixed in the same manner as the machines in Hollawell v. Eastwood was considered to pass to a mortgagee as fixtures; and so also in Walmesley v. Milne, the fact that the machinery was so fastened as to admit of severance without injury to the building, or the things fixed was also disregarded by the Court; as were also in Olimie v. Wood, the special additional facts found by the jury, that the object of annexation was for the more convenient use of the things fixed, and not to improve the inheritance (p. 137). We think that the case of Hollawell v. Eastwood was well distinguished from cases like the present in question depended mainly upon (1) the mode and extent of annexation to the soil or fabric of the house whether it can easily be removed integro, salve et commodum or not without injury to itself or the fabric of the building. (2) whether it was for permanent and substantial improvement in the dwelling, or merely for a temporary purpose.] does state the true principles, though it may be questioned if they were in that case correctly applied to the facts (p. 337). But there is another view of the matter which weighs strongly with us. Mellissell v. Bickwood was a decision between landlord and tenant, not so likely to influence those who advance money on mortgage as Mather v. Fraser, which was decided in 1836, and has been acted upon in Baill v. Shorrocks (L. R. 5 Eq. 73) by the Court of Queen's Bench in Loughbottom v. Berry, and in Ireland in Re Dawson (11 L. R. 2 Eq. 222). These cases are too recent to have been themselves much acted upon, but they show that Mather v. Fraser has been generally adopted as the ruling case. We cannot, therefore, doubt that much money has, during the last sixteen years, been advanced on the faith of the decision in Mather v. Fraser. It is of great importance that the law as to what is the security of the mortgage should be settled; and without going so far as to say that a decision only sixteen years old should be upheld, right or wrong, on the principle that communis error facit jus, we feel that it should not be reversed unless we clearly see that it is wrong. As already said, we are rather inclined to think that, if it were res integra, we should find the same way — p. 340

BRETT, M.R.—In the consideration of law the machines are part of the land, and these belts were fixed to the machines, and were part of the land: for everything which is a necessary part of the machine is part of the land, and passes under the mortgage, and no registration is required. I think that Longbottom v. Berry was right. The judgment of Field, J. (in the Court below) is inconsistent with it; he evidently thought it wrong. It is, however, a decision which must be followed. The learned judge seems to think that the decision in Longbottom v. Berry proceeded on the admitted facts in that case. I decline to follow that view. I think that a principle of law was laid down which must be observed in subsequent cases.—p. 361

LINDLEY, L.J.—Those cases turned on the new, rightly or wrongly—I do not pause to consider that now—that the chattels were unfixed, and properly unfixed on the implied authority given by the mortgagees. It is impossible to say that these loans were unfixed by the implied authority given by the mortgagees. . . . Gough v. Wood really does not apply to the case at all.—p. 327

(for the Court).—There can be no doubt upon a mortgage in fee of the land, that as between the mortgagee and mortgagee, the mortgagee is entitled to all fixtures which may be upon the land whether placed there before or after the mortgage. If North, J., in the passage in his judgment which has been referred to in Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Co., meant to hold otherwise, in our opinion he was in error; but we doubt if he intended so to hold. The case of Gough v. Wood is decided in this Court, in no way assents the plaintiff, and has no application to the present case. That case was decided solely upon the ground that the mortgagee had acquiesced in the removal by the mortgagee during his tenancy of trade fixtures. For additional confirmation of the ratio decidendi of this case what was said by Lindley, L.J. and by Kay, L.J. in Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister may be referred to.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The case that comes nearest to this one is D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, the case about tapestry, where Lord Romilly, in construing a will, held that certain unfixed articles passed with the house, because, as he says, they were strictly and properly part of the architectural design of the hall and staircase and put in as such, as distinguished from mere ornaments. Can anybody say that these birds, which were put in the museum to be looked at and enjoyed while they were there, were put there as part of the architectural design of the room? See what that means. Suppose a bird gets moth-eaten, if it is a fixture it cannot be taken out, but must be left to rot and be eaten up by maggots. That cannot be.—p. 707.

Elwes v. Maw (1802) 5 East 38, 6 R. R. 523. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—The Nisi Prius case of Dean v. Allalloy is a case of the erection and removal by the tenant of two sheds, called Dutch barns, which were, I will assume, unquestionably fixtures. . . . Lord Kenyon there uniformly mentions the benefit of trade, as if it were a building subservient to some purposes of trade; and never mentions agriculture, for the purposes of which it was erected. He certainly seems, however, to have thought that buildings erected by tenants for the purposes of farming were, or rather ought to be, governed by the same rules which had been so long judiciously holden to apply in the case of buildings for the purposes of trade. But the case of buildings for trade has been always put and recognised as a locus in loco, exception from the general rule which obtains as to other buildings, and the circumstance of its being so treated and considered establishes the existence of the general rule to which it is considered as an exception.—p. 56.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—I am not satisfied that Lord Ellenborough [in Elwes v. Maw] dissented from Lord Kenyon's view [in Penton v. Robart], so far as market gardeners were concerned. If, however, there be any difference between Lord Kenyon and Lord Ellenborough, I prefer the view that glass-houses erected by a nurseryman for the purpose of carrying on his trade may be removed. The dicta of Lord Bramwell in Wake v. Hall (8 App. Cas. 210) support this view. Moreover, the whole tendency of the Courts in recent years has been to enlarge the rights of tenants in respect of fixtures. Nor do I consider that there is anything in the judgment of Kindersley, V.-C. in Whitehead v. Bennett which ought to lead me to a contrary conclusion.

JESSEL, M. R.—In no way, as it appears to me, does the decision, or any of the grounds of decision, in Attwood v. Small support the proposition that it is a good defence in an action for rescission of who comes to set aside the contract inquired to a certain extent, but did it carelessly and inefficiently, and would, if he had used reasonable

Hurd, where the late Master of the Rolls is reported to have said (at p. 213).—"If it is a material representation calculated to induce him to enter into the contract, it is an inference of law that he was induced by the representation to enter into it, and in order to take away his title to be relieved from the contract on the ground that the representation was untrue, it must be shown either that he had knowledge of the facts contrary to the representation, or that he stated in terms, or showed clearly by his conduct, that he did not rely on the representation." The next case is Smith v. Chadwick (20 Ch. D. 27), where, at p. 44, the M. R. says—"Again, on the question of the materiality of the statement, if the Court sees, on the face of it, that it is of such a nature as would induce a person to enter into the contract . . . the inference is, if he entered into the contract that he acted on the inducement so held out, and you want no evidence that he did so act." The same case came before the House of Lords (9 App. Cas. 187; 32 W. R.
687), and at p. 196 Lord Blackburn makes these remarks—"I think that, if it is proved that the defendants, with a view to induce the plaintiff to enter into a contract, made a statement to the plaintiff of such a nature as would be likely to induce a person to enter into a contract, and it is proved that the plaintiff did enter into the contract, it is a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the statement.
In Redgrave v. Hurd, the late Master of the Rolls is reported to have said, that it was an inference of law. If he really meant this, he retracts it in his observations in the present case." Then, again, in another case of Smith v. Land and House Property Corporation (28 Ch. D. 16), Bowen, L. J. says—"I cannot quite agree with the remark of the late Master of the Rolls in Redgrave v. Hurd—that, if a material representation calculated to induce a person to enter into a contract is made to him, it is an inference of law that he was induced by the representations to enter into it, and I think that probably his lordship hardly intended to go so far as that, though there may be strong reason for drawing such an inference as an inference of fact." Now, looking at these cases as stating the law correctly, I come to the conclusion that it is not a presumption of law, but an important piece of evidence from which, if there is nothing else, the Court may draw the inference of fact that the plaintiff was induced by the statement to enter into the contract.

[It was pointed out during the argument that the words "of law" in the phrase "it is an inference of law," from the judgment in Redgrave v. Hard, occur only in 20 Ch. D. 21, and not in any of the contemporaneous reports.]

Newbigging v. Adam (1887) 55 L. J. Ch. 275; 34 Ch. D. 582; 55 L. T. 794, 35 W. R. 597.—C.A. COTTON, BOWEN and FRY, L.J.; affirmed, nom. Adam v. Newbigging (1888) 57 L. J. Ch. 1066; 18 App. Cas. 808, 39 L. T. 267; 37 W. R. 97.—H.L. (G.). LORDS HALSBURY, L.C., WATSON, PITZGERALD and HERSCHELL.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is said that the injured party is entitled to be replaced in status quo. It seems to me that when you are dealing with innocent misrepresentation you must understand that proposition that he is to be replaced in status quo with this limitation—that he is not to be replaced in exactly the same position in all respects, otherwise he would be entitled to recover damages, but is to be replaced in his position so far as regards the rights and obligations which have been created by the contract into which he has been induced to enter. That seems to me to be the true doctrine, and I think it is put in the neatest way in Redgrave v. Hard. In that case there was a misrepresentation, but, though there was a suggestion of fraud in the pleadings, the C.A. thought that fraud was not so expressly pleaded as to enable the Court to treat the case as one of fraud, and that the relief given must depend on misrepresentation alone. The M.R., so treating it, says: "Before going into the details . . . belief that it was true." With great respect for the shadow and memory of that great name, I cannot help saying that this is not a perfect exposition of what the common law was, but, so far as the rule of equity goes, I must assume that the M.R. spoke with full knowledge of the equity authorities, and he treats the relief as being the giving back by the party who made the misrepresentation of the advantages he obtained by the contract. Now these advantages may be of two kinds. He may get an advantage in the shape of an actual benefit, as when he receives money, or he may also get an advantage if the party with whom he contracts assumes some burden in consideration of the contract. In such a case it seems to me that complete rescission would not be effected unless the misrepresenting party not only hands back the benefits which he has himself received—but also re-assumes the burden which under the contract the injured person has taken upon himself. Speaking only for myself, I should not like to lay down the proposition that a person is to be restored to the position which he held before the misrepresentation was made, nor that the person injured must be indemnified against loss which arises out of the contract, unless you place upon the words "out of the contract" the limited and special meaning which I have endeavoured to shadow forth. Loss arising out of the contract is a term which would be too wide. It would embrace damages at common law, because damages at common law are only given upon the supposition that they are damages which would naturally and reasonably follow from the injury done. I think Redgrave v. Hard shows that it would be too wide, because in that case the Court excluded from the relief which was given the damages which had been sustained by the plaintiff in removing his business, and other similar items. There ought, as it appears to me, to be a giving back and a taking back on both sides, including the giving back and taking back of the obligations which the contract has created, as well as the giving back and taking back of the advantages. There is nothing in Rawlinson v. Wickham (3 De G. & J. 304, see post, "PARTNERSHIP") which carries the doctrine beyond that. In that case, one of three partners having retired, the remaining partners introduced the plaintiff into the firm, and he, under his contract with them, took upon himself to share with them the liabilities which otherwise they would have borne in their entirety. That was a burden which he took under the contract and in virtue of the contract. It seems to me, therefore, that upon this principle indemnity was rightly decreed as regards the liabilities of the new firm.

BACON, V.-C.—Upon grounds of public policy it may be right that a needy, improvident youth who desires to raise money upon his expectancy for the purpose of discharging debts contracted in his monage, or to furnish him with the means of indulging in luxury and extravagances, ought to be protected against the sordid and corrupt practices of persons who seek to make a profit out of such a man's inexperience, but this principle must be, as it always has been, applied with caution, and it has never yet been held that an expectant heir was incompetent to deal with his interests for substantial purposes, or that the persons dealing with him could have their transactions impeached unless there was something so morally wrong as to make it necessary to discontinue their dealings upon grounds of public policy. It may be thought that some of the older cases went too far, and of this opinion was Lord Brougham, who in Lord Aldborough v. Trye not only expressed doubts about the rule supposed to be deduced from Gowland v. De Faria (17 Ves. 20), but observes that if any such rule was universally applicable, it would render an expectant heir unable to sell or deal with his expectancies at all

STUART, V.-C.—The rule [in *Edwards v. That was, in short, the result of the decision in Edwards v. Burt—a result opposed to the understanding of every lawyer and man of common sense, and it was not to be wondered at that Lord St. Leonards, in his 14th edition of Vendors and Purchasers, at p. 279, should say, after expressing his dissatisfaction with the rule, that that decision was much to be regretted.—p. 525.

Wood v. Dixie, explained and distinguished.
Moloney, In re (1887) 21 L. R. Ir. 27.—C.A.
SIR M. MORRIS—I do not quarrel with the decision in that case. It decides that it was a wrong direction for the judge to give the jury, that the mere attempt to defeat one particular creditor, where money passed, and everything was bona fide, made the conveyance of the property void under the statute of Elizabeth. The decision is only that on the facts of the case the direction was bad. Why? Because the statute does not say that the deed shall be avoided when it constitutes a fraud that would defeat the creditors. But that implies that it is a fraud, and that it would defeat creditors. The Court only laid down in that case, as I understand it, that the mere defeating of a creditor was not sufficient to warrant such a direction by the judge, although it might afford good evidence for the jury to act on. But now, even taking that distinction, which goes to the very marrow of Wood v. Duce—a case which I think has often been cited to support propositions which it does not support—is there not here a parting with the £25 10s. for no good consideration at all? In Wood v. Duce there was a good consideration, viz., the £25 10s. was parted with for no consideration, and the £117 has followed suit with the £25 10s.—pp. 50, 51.

POLLOCK, B.—The case before us is not like that of Spencer v. Slater, for there is this great distinction, that here the primary object was a transfer for purposes of sale as a going concern, and not for the purpose of carrying on the business (p. 51). . . . In Spencer v. Slater there was special circumstances. In the first place the deed contained not merely the ordinary resulting trusts as to the surplus which would be found in every deed, but a resulting trust, under which, at the expiration of twelve months, the debtor might apply to the trustees to be paid the dividends of creditors who neglected or refused to assent to or execute the deed, and then if the creditors did not within seven days assent or execute, the money was to be paid to the debtor, thus was clearly much beyond the ordinary resulting trust, and then again, as I have already mentioned in that case, the primary trust was to carry on the business, and it is principal object is to sell the business, and it is subsidiary to that object that power should be given to carry it on till the sale. In that case, too, there was a very special and general indemnity. It is quite right that trustees should be indemnified in certain cases, such, for instance, as their having to endorse bills of exchange, and that is what is found in this case. The indemnity in Spencer v. Slater went very much further, and, from all circumstances of that case taken together, the Court came to the conclusion that they ought to draw the inference that the assignment was intended to defeat creditors, and was therefore void under the statute of Elizabeth. The circumstances here are, as I have pointed out, very different, and would not warrant us in arriving at the same conclusion.—p. 52.

ALVERSTONE, C.J.—It is contended that the deed is void under 18 Eliz. c. 5, as tending to defeat and delay the execution creditors, because upon the face of it it reserves certain benefits for the debtor himself. In support of this contention Spencer v. Slater was cited, where the Court had to consider the effect of the statute 18 Eliz. c. 5 upon the validity of a deed which had been made in order to prevent an execution. That case cannot be regarded as laying down any general principle apart from its particular facts. It was not so considered in Boldere v. London, & Discount Co. It was decided without reference to Alton v. Harrison, and is difficult to reconcile with that case and many others, if it decides that any benefit reserved to the debtor makes the deed void. The question is, is the deed a bona fide deed of arrangement, or is it a mere cloak to cover a very different transaction? If it is bona fide, then it is a good deed and not void within the statute of Elizabeth. Many composition deeds provide that the debtor's business may be carried on by him, and reserve some ultimate benefit to the debtor. We are asked to say that all such deeds are bad on the face of them as against creditors who do not assent. I am not prepared to do so. Alton v. Harrison was recognised in Boldere v. London, & Discount Co., and the result is that the mere omission of the execution creditors from this deed, although intentional, does not invalidate the deed.—p. 478.

KAY, J.—The actual decision in Prodgers v Langham was that a lease for the benefit of a daughter, if she married with her father's consent, being voluntarily, would be void against a subsequent purchaser for value by virtue of the 27 Eliz. c. 14, but although so void it might be made effectual against such purchaser by a subsequent marriage of the daughter upon the faith of it. This seems to have proceeded upon the ground that the subsequent consideration of the marriage related back as though the settlement had been made upon the marriage. George v. Milbank (9 Ves. 190) was a contest between the creditors of an appointor—who in his lifetime had exercised a general power of appointment over a fund in favour of a volunteer—and a purchaser after his death from the volunteer of £500, part of the appointed fund. By the equitable rule the exercise of the power made the appointed fund assets to pay debts of the appointor. Lord Eldon after much consideration held that the purchaser of the £500 had the better claim. There was no question under either 18 Eliz. c. 5 or 27 Eliz. c. 4, and Lord Eldon, treating Prodgers v Langham as a binding authority, and saying that there had been frequent decisions according to that case, points out that the purchaser there had the legal estate, which looks as though he regarded it as a decision under the equitable doctrine that the Court shall not take the legal estate from an innocent purchaser. In Payne v Mortimer (4 De G. & J. 447), Turner, L.J. in his judgment says this: "It was not denied creditors of the settlor." This seems to be a clear recognition by Turner, L.J. that sect. 6 of 18 Eliz. c. 5 does protect a purchaser for value without notice of the interest derived under a settlement which the statute would make void against creditors as to other persons claiming under it.

HATHRELLEY, L.C.—The Vice-Chancellor seems to have felt himself very much pressed by the case of Sprett v Willows and the dicta of Lord Westbury in that case. The first of these dicta is (3 D. J. & S. 902) "If the debt of the creditor by whom the voluntary settlement is impeached existed at the date of the settlement, and it is shown that the remedy of the creditor is defeated or delayed by the existence of the settlement, it is immaterial whether the debtor was or was not solvent after making the settlement." The Vice-Chancellor seems to have thought himself bound by this expression of opinion, and to have set aside the settlement upon that ground alone. It is clear, however, that this expression of opinion on the part of the Lord Chancellor was by no means necessary for the decision of the case before him, where the settlor was guilty of a plain and manifest fraud. It is expressed in very large terms, probably too large.—p. 543 GIFFARD, L.J.—In this case I quite agree with the Vice-Chancellor in thinking that if the propositions laid down in Sprett v Willows are taken as abstract propositions, they go too far and beyond what the law is, but if they are taken in connection with the facts of that case, then undoubtedly there is abundantly enough to support the decision; for there was a voluntary settlement by a man who at its date was solvent, but immediately afterwards realised the rest of his property and denounced himself of everything. Of course the irresistible conclusion from that was, that the voluntary settlement was intended to defeat the subsequent creditors. That being so I do not think the Vice-Chancellor need have felt any difficulty about the case of Sprett v Willows, but he seems to have considered that in order to defeat a voluntary settlement there must be proof of an actual and express intent to defeat creditors. That, however, is not so.—p. 544.

BRETT, L.J.—With one exception, none of the authorities cited before us in the least militate against our decision; they all seem to show that the fraud of a party to a suit is an extrinsic and collateral act which will vitiate the judgment. The exception is to be found in the doubts expressed by James, L.J., with the assent of Thesiger, L.J., in Flower v Lloyd. It seems to me that the fraud alleged in that action was probably fraud on the part of certain servants of the party, and not fraud brought home to the party himself; moreover, it was, as I understand, fraud committed not before the Court itself at the trial of the action, but previously to the case being brought to a hearing before the Court. It is to be taken that the doubts of James and Thesiger, L.JJ. related to a fraud of a party to the action committed before the Court itself for the purpose of deceiving the Court, I cannot, after having heard the present argument, agree with the doubts expressed by them. These doubts are not binding, and no decision as to the effect of fraud was pronounced by these noble justices in Flower v Lloyd—p 807

FRY, J.—There is one other observation which I ought to make before parting with this part of the case [i.e., fraud and voidance of the mortgage], viz., that Exton v Scott appears to me not to be an authority governing the present case, for the reason pointed out by Mr. Cockson. There the grantor was not insolvent when he executed the deed, and he remained in a state of solvency for twelve years afterwards. The Vice-Chancellor, therefore, held that the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5 did not apply—p 11

If authority were wanted in support of a principle so common as to that to which their lordships have adverted, it may be found in the case which is referred to in the judgment of the Court below (*Clarke v. JESSEL, M.R.—The principle of MacKay v. Douglas and that line of cases is this, that a man is not entitled to go into a hazardous business, and immediately before doing so settle all his property voluntarily, the object being this, “If I succeed in business, I make a fortune for myself. If I fail I leave my creditors unpaid. They will bear the loss.” That is the very thing which the statute of Elizabeth was meant to prevent. The object of the settlor was to put his property out of the reach of his future creditors. He contemplated engaging in this new trade, and he wanted to preserve his property from his future creditors. That cannot be done by a voluntary settlement. That is, to my mind, a clear and satisfactory principle (p 598). . . [In the present case] his object was to make himself safe against that eventually [non-success of the business], and, if that was his object, then I think the principle of MacKay v. Douglas applies, and that the deed was void also under the statute of Elizabeth—p. 599

STUART, V.C.—I have already said in the course of the argument that there is a great mistake in the marginal epitome of that case, and that there is not one word in Lord Cottonham’s judgment to justify so extraordinary a proposition as that this Court will not interfere against a possession fraudulently taken, whether the works are constructed or not. Looking at Lord Cottonham’s judgment the grounds of it appear perfectly plain. The case of Deere v. Guest was decided on demurrer, and the only question was whether, on the allegations in the bill, there was enough to show that the plaintiff would be entitled, on his case stated, to relief in a Court of equity; and Lord Cottenham thought not, because what was claimed by the defendants was simply a right of way, and the case stated by the bill was a state of mere trespass, and upon that ground, on demurrer, he affirmed the judgment of the V.-C. of England by which the demurrer was allowed.

SELBORNE, L.C.—The other class of cases is that exemplified by Deere v. Guest, which, when rightly considered, amounted to neither more nor less than an action of ejectment brought in the Court of Chancery without any equitable circumstances to induce that Court to assume jurisdiction. [His lordship having stated the facts, continued.] In that state of circumstances Lord Cottenham thought—and in my judgment was quite right in thinking—that there was no equity to interfere, and that the case was a simple attempt to transfer the jurisdiction in ejectment from law to equity—p. 225.

Clifford v. Brooke (1806) 13 Ves. 131.

ERSKINE, L.C.—With regard to Pasley v. Freeman, a considerable difference of opinion prevails; and some of the most correct judgments appear to me to have been surprised. My opinion upon this species of action does not concur with that of Lord Eldon as expressed in the case of Evans v. Bicknell, which opinion, against that action, I know his lordship constantly held in the Court of Common Pleas. The mistake of those who invade the principle of that action, consists in this. The proposition is not, that, if a man asked, whether a third person may be trusted, answers, "you may trust him—he is a very honest man, and worthy of trust," an action will lie, if he proves otherwise. There must be the knowledge at the time. That is the sound principle; that the defendant knowing that person to be dishonest, insolvent, and unworthy of trust, made the representation, and that is the subject of an action, or of a bill in equity, where it is necessary and fit, that equity should interpose the concurrent jurisdiction. . . . That case of Pasley v. Freeman, therefore, stands upon the clearest principles of jurisprudence.—p. 182.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I think the authorities establish the following propositions. First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. . . . Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial.

Prentice v. London and Mortimer v. Glover (1875) 19 L. J. Ex. 20, 4 Ex. 430, 14 J. P. 81.—EX.
And see BUILDING SOCIETY, under earlier Act, 1875, where a dispute arose between a person who had been a member of a registered society and the society, as to whether the society had a right to expel him, which they had assumed to do, the dispute was not one which had to be decided by virtue of the section in the manner directed by the rules of the society, and that the jurisdiction of the High Court was not ousted.
For the reasons given in those cases I am of opinion that they were rightly decided. . .

Those decisions really come to this—that if a society chooses to expel a member, it is stopped from afterwards saying that he is a member, and therefore bound by the rules. . . The decisions are equally applicable under the later Act [Friendly Societies Act, 1895 (58 & 60 Vict.
c. 26), s. 10], and the plaintiff cannot be shut out from his right to have the dispute adjudicated upon by the High Court.—p. 239

ESHER, M.R.—The Divisional Court have treated the matter as a case within the judgment in Reg. v. Grant. I think the Court misconstrued the decision in that case, for the jurisdiction of the arbitrators thus depended upon a condition precedent which must have existed before they could enter upon the arbitration so as to decide it. The justices were therefore right in inquiring into those preceding facts, in order to determine whether they existed, so as to give them jurisdiction or not. That is not the case here. There is no such preliminary fact to be inquired into.—p. 111.

LORD CHELMSFORD—As animals feræ naturæ which killed or reduced into possession by the owner of land where they are found, or by his authority, become instantly his property, does the unauthorised act of a trespasser by the very fact of killing them, convert them at once to the use of the owner of the land? To this question Lord Holt, according to the case which he puts in Sutton v. Moody, would have given a distinct answer, that provided the game was both started and killed on the ground of the same owner, the property would be in him.
But I cannot so easily discover the principle upon which he proceeds when he said, that "if A starts a hare on the ground of B, and hunts it into the ground of C and kills it there, the property is in A, the hunter, but A is liable to an action of trespass for hunting in the grounds as well of B, as of C". It would appear to me to be more in accordance with principle, to hold that, if the trespasser deprived the owner of the land where the game was started, of his right to claim the property, by unlawfully killing it on the land of another to which he had driven it, he converted it into a subject of property for that other owner, and not for himself. But the first proposition started by Lord Holt, with respect to game started and killed on the land of the same owner, is free from all difficulty, and is sufficient to dispose of the present question.
The case of Sutton v. Moody has always been regarded as an authority on this point, and as far as I can ascertain, has never been questioned.
It was recognised in Churchward v. Studdy (14 East 249), in Graham v. Ewart (11 Ex. 329, 1 H. & N. 550; 7 H. L. Cas. 331); by Martin, B. in Ragg v. Lord Lovelace (11 Ex. 654); and in this last case when before the Court of Error (1 H. & N. 923), Coleridge, J. said, "The grouse shot" (i.e., shot by the defendant, at a wrong door)
"on the land of the plaintiff, belonged to him according to all the authorities—p. 639.

A L SMITH, J. —In my judgment the Act [Ground Game Act, 1881] was passed throughout in the interests of tenants, and of tenants alone, and can only be brought into play in cases where a landlord and an agricultural tenant both exist, and then interests with regard to the ground game are antagonistic. That was the view of the Act taken by Mathew, J and myself in Smith v Hunt.—p 717.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—The statute provided that the occupier should always have the right given by sect. 1 to kill and take ground game, and that that statutory right should be inseparable from the occupation of the land. It is quite true that the right is given subject to limitations and conditions, and I quite agree that these limitations and conditions are wholly inapplicable to the case of a landowner occupying his own land and retaining the right of shooting. It is for that reason that I think that Smith v Hunt was absolutely correctly decided. . . But where a landlord in occupation of his own land has parted with the right of shooting I cannot see that the conditions are inapplicable. In such a case it seems to me that the landlord occupier is entitled to the statutory right to kill game, and that the conditions are not only not applicable, but are proper.—p 718

LORD HERSCHELL.—It (Keeble v Hickeringill) is, however, treated in their opinions by the majority of the learned judges as establishing the wide and far-reaching proposition that every man has a right to pursue his trade or calling without molestation or obstruction, and that anyone who by any act, though it be not otherwise unlawful, molests or obstructs him is guilty of a wrong unless he can show lawful justification or excuse for so doing. The case of Keeble v Hickeringill was decided about two centuries ago, but I cannot find that it has ever been treated, unless it be quite recently, as establishing the broad general proposition alleged. . .

Carrington v Taylor was also relied on by the respondents. It is, I believe, the only case which has been expressly based on Keeble v Hickeringill. The plaintiff there possessed an ancient decoy, and the defendant sought his livelihood by shooting wild fowl from a boat on the water, for which boat with small arms, he had a licence from the Admiralty for fishing and coasting along the shores of Essex. The decoy was near a salt creek where the tide ebbs and flows. The only proof of disturbance of the decoy by the defendant was that, being in his boat shooting wild fowl in a part of the open creek, he had fired his fowling-piece, first within a quarter of a mile of the decoy and afterwards within 200 yards of it, and had killed several wildgeese. The judge left these facts to the jury as evidence of a wilful disturbance of the plaintiff's decoy by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for 10s. damages, and the Court, on the motion for a new trial, refused to disturb the verdict. They gave no reasons for their judgment. Unless a decoy possesses some peculiar privileges in the eye of the law, I confess myself quite unable to understand why the defendant was liable to an action or was not within his rights in shooting the wild fowl at the place he did for the purpose of gaining a livelihood, which is stated to have been his object. In any case the decision affords no support to the contention now under consideration.

SMITH, J.—In Turner v Morgan there was no search, but Brett, J is reported to have repeated what he said in the former case (Clarke v Crowder). But it was not necessary in this last-mentioned case to decide whether the seisure and detainer must be in a highway, for there was no finding of game on the appellant, and consequently no legal seizure and detainer at all. The game was found in the possession of some one else, and none of the matters required to give jurisdiction existed. I think that if Brett, J.

and had the effect of such a decision—namely, but the statute would be rendered nugatory in the way I have pointed out [by making it possible for a man who has been searched to evade the statute by afterwards throwing the game over a hedge, or into a ditch by the side of the highway]—present to his mind, he would not have used the expressions he is reported to have used.—p. 729

DENMAN, J. (for the Court).—In the case of Beeston v. Beeston, which was most relied upon, the Court only held that the plaintiff could recover on a cheque given by defendant to the plaintiff for the amount of moneys received by the defendant for winnings on bets made by the defendant with third persons, as agent for the plaintiff. This was held not to be the case of an action upon a contract by way of wagering, but of one brought upon a cheque, given for money received by the defendant for which he was liable to account to the plaintiff. Johnson v. Lansley (12 C. B. 468), was a similar case, and is no authority for the plaintiff in the present case, who sues upon the contract itself.—p. 79.

JESSEL, M. R.—I must say, speaking with some hesitation, as I always do, when differing from any judgment of Lord Cottenham's, that that reasoning, to my mind, is inconclusive and unsatisfactory. The notion that because a transaction which is illegal is closed, that therefore a Court of equity is to interfere in dividing the proceeds of the illegal transaction, is not only opposed to principle but to authority—to authority in the well-known case of highwaymen where a robbery had been committed, and one highwayman unsuccessfully sued the other for a division of the proceeds of the robbery. So in the case he puts of one of two partners engaged in merchant trade. As I read it, he meant the trade of smuggling goods. If two persons go partners as smugglers, can one maintain a bill against the other to have an account of the smuggling transactions? I should say certainly not. It is not sufficient to say that the transaction is concluded as a reason for the interference of the Court. If that were the reason, it would be lending the aid of the Court to assert the rights of the parties in carrying out and completing an illegal contract. If the partnership is for the purpose of smuggling, that is an illegal contract, and the Court cannot maintain it, and the Court will not lend its aid at all to it. That reasoning, then, of Lord Cottenham is not sufficient, and I should have answered the question—not as Lord Cottenham does, in the affirmative—but in the negative. I do not say that this observation at all affects the authority of Sharp v. Taylor as it stands, but I think it does affect very much the dicta which I have read from the judgment, and that is the reason I have read them. It is no part of the duty of a Court of justice to aid either in carrying out an illegal contract, or in dividing the proceeds arising from an illegal contract, between the parties to that illegal contract. In my opinion, no action can be maintained for the one purpose more than for the other.—p. 194

BRETT, M. R.—The case of Beyer v. Adams is the only one in favour of the argument which has been urged on behalf of the defendant, and the time has now come when, unless some distinction (which I do not see) can be found between it and the other authorities to which I have referred, that case can no longer stand. In my opinion the decision there was a wrong one, and must be overruled. Its doctrine was well challenged by the case of Beeston v. Beeston. In that case, which is to be found much more fully reported in 33 L. T. 700, Amplett, B. cites Sharp v. Taylor, and shows that what was held in Beyer v. Adams, was inconsistent with what Lord Cottenham decided in Sharp v. Taylor, so that Beyer v. GATENS, L.C.—There is no authority in favour of the view of the defendant except Batty v Marriott, and if that authority is to be followed it cannot be denied it is a very strong authority for the defendant. What the Court laid in their minds in that case was the question whether the game was a lawful or an unlawful game, and having come to the conclusion that it was a lawful game, they were of opinion that there was nothing in the case which was struck at by the Act of Parliament, and that the Act was only intended to strike at unlawful games. That view seems to me to be erroneous, and I think the Court overlooked the first part of the section, which applies to all contracts, lawful or unlawful, by way of gaming or wagering. When Batson v Newman came before this Court, although there was a certain degree of difference between that case and Batty v Marriott, yet it is obvious that Batty v Marriott did not meet with approval. I cannot follow that case.—p. 127.

Trumble v Hild (1870) 5 App. Cas. 842, 40 L. J. P. C. 40; 42 L. T. 103; 28 W. R. 479.—P.C. SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for J.C.).—The meaning of this proviso (exempting from the enactment "any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise") has been considered in several cases in the English Courts. In Betty v Marriott, where an agreement analogous to the present was made and money deposited to abate the event of a foot-race, it was held that, a foot-race being a legal pastime, the agreement was within the proviso. This decision did not meet with entire acquiescence when it was brought before the Courts in subsequent cases. It is unnecessary to refer to these cases, because the decision itself has been distinctly overruled by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Diggle v Higgs. In that case the agreement related to a walking match, and was to the same effect as that in the present action. It was decided that an agreement of this kind, being a contract of wager, was not an agreement to subscribe or contribute for or towards any prize or sum of money within the true meaning of the proviso, which it was held applied to subscriptions and contributions other than wagers. It is not disputed by the two judges forming the majority in the Court below, that this decision was directly in point; but their own opinions not agreeing with it, they declined to follow its authority. Their lordships think the Court in the colony might well have taken this decision as an authoritative construction of the statute. It is the judgment of the Court of Appeal, by which all the Courts in England are bound until a contrary determination has been arrived at by the House of Lords. Their lordships think that in colonies, where a like enactment has been passed by the Legislature, the colonial Courts should also govern themselves by it. The judges of the Supreme Court, who differed from the Chief Justice, were evidently reluctant to depart from their own previous decision in a case of Hogan v Curtis (5 Sup. Court Rep. 292), but they might well have yielded to the high authority of the Court of Appeal which decided the case of Diggle v Higgs, as the English Court which decided Batty v. Marriot would have felt bound to do if a similar case had again come before it. Their lordships would not have felt themselves justified in advising her Majesty to depart from the decision in Diggle v. Higgs unless they entertained a clear opinion that the construction it has given to the proviso in question was wrong, and had not settled the law; since in their view it is of the utmost importance that in all parts of the empire where English law prevails, the interpretation of that law by the Courts should be as nearly as possible the same. Their lordships, however, do not dissent from, nor do they desire to express any doubt as to the correctness of that decision, which, it may be assumed, has settled the vexed question of construction of a not very intelligible enactment. Diggle v Higgs also decided that the statute does not preclude the party who has revoked the authority given to the stakeholder from recovering the money he has deposited; the Court of Appeal agreeing with a previous decision to the same effect of the Court of Queen's Bench in Hampden v. Walsh (1 Q. B. D. 180).—p. 344

MANFIELD, C.J. (for the Court).—I must take notice of one case, a very strong one, Lacausade v. White, where the Court said that it was more consonant to policy that money paid on an illegal contract might be recovered back, than that it should be retained. That was a strong case certainly in favour of the present defendant; but this doctrine is directly contrary to what Lord Kenyon, C.J. said afterwards in Howson v. Hancock (8 T. R. 675), where he seems to have entirely forgotten Lacausade v. White. Lord Kenyon there says, "There is no case to be found where, when money has been actually paid by one of two parties to the other upon an illegal contract, both being parties in armis, an action has been maintained to recover it back again." Now this is directly contrary to Lacausade v. White, and he afterwards says that Howson v. Hancock is very different from that case, which he says "was the case of a stake recovered from a stakeholder before it had been paid over." But here he certainly mistook Lacausade v. White entirely, for there is no stakeholder in the case, nor anything like it, and in 1 East 98 (Vandryck v. Wandry), it was said by Lord Kenyon that the rule had been settled in all times that where both parties were in pari delicto, potius est conditio possidentis. I mention these cases to show that the authority of Lacausade v. White is very much shaken, and cannot be relied on, and that we do not decide on the authority of that case.—p. 283.

ESHER, M.R.—Gave J held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the securities, but not the money. The defendants appealed to this Court, and this Court held that the judgment of Gave, J. as regards the securities was right. Now the plaintiff appeals as regards the money deposited.

It seems to me that the judgment I am about to accede to must go this length, that if a person making bets with another is so foolish as to deposit money with the other party to abide the result of the bets, once the bets are decided he can never recover the money, whatever may have been the event of the wager. The party who holds the money can keep it, even though he has in fact lost the wager. That, upon the true construction of the statute, appears to me to be the result of the Gaming Act, 1845. . . I am fortified in this view by what was said by James, L.J. in Manning v Purcell. . . Upon the ground that the provisions of the statute apply, I am obliged to decide that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in his action as regards the money deposited with the defendant.—p. 180.

LINDLEY, L.J.—When that case comes to be examined it will be found that it did not turn on sect. 4, n. 1, but on sects. 4 and 5. Those sections deal with persons who use the occupiers of "a place," and the decision of the Court there was that the place in question—a space under a tree in Hyde Park—was not capable of occupation.
No doubt some of the judges in that case seem to express a doubt whether that could be "a place" within the meaning of the Act, but, when understood, the case does not present any difficulty.

MATHEW, J.—It was urged that the decision in Whitehurst v. Fincher was an authority in favour of the respondent in the present case, but in that case all that was found against the respondent, who was charged with using a room for the purpose of betting, was that three times he went to a public-house and made bets. Under such circumstances the Court was unable to come to the conclusion that the room was used for the purpose of betting within the Act, for if it had been intended to make all betting in public-houses illegal, the Act would have contained an express provision to that effect

LINDLEY, L.J.—The only other case which is really material is Whitehurst v. Fincher, in which it was held that the bar of a public-house was not a "place" within the meaning of sect. 8. I confess that I felt some difficulty with regard to that case, but our attention has been drawn to what Mathew, J., who was one of the judges deciding it, said about it in Hornsby v. Raggett (vide supra). . . Snow v. Hill is no authority for the respondent, since in that case the person charged did not use any definite spot, but merely walked about a field, in which racing was taking place, betting with people whom he met

[In Liddell v. Loftthouse the question was whether a piece of ground bounded by a boarding and by stays supporting the boarding, was a "place" within sect 3.]

HALESBURY, I.C.—As the case of Hawke v. Dunn is said to have given rise to this litigation, I wish to examine the grounds of that decision. I am unable to accept the reasoning in that case, nor do I think it consistent with the previous authorities or with itself. In the first place I find that reliance is placed upon the fact that the bookmakers who bet are professional bookmakers. I know of no canon of construction which can introduce such words into an Act of Parliament, and certainly there are no such words here. I cannot doubt that if the prohibited thing is done, whatever that prohibited thing is, by a person who does it for the first time in his life, he is just as amenable to the law as though he had been for many years in the practice of it. Let a man open a house for such a purpose, and though he never in fact made a bet or received a deposit, though the proof might be difficult, yet the offence, if proved, would be consummated. While at the end of the judgment I find those words "The law does not forbid betting itself, nor is the business or avocation of a bookmaker necessarily illegal." But what the legislature has forbidden, and what it has pronounced to be illegal, is the use by those who make a trade and business of betting of any place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. I will not again refer to the fallacious employment of the word "use"; what I at present insist upon is the selecting of such persons indicated by the words as if the Act of Parliament had made any difference between different classes of persons, and as if professional bettors were in any different position from any other members of the public. In another part of the judgment I find the learned judge saying "In my opinion, to limit the meaning of the words 'other place' to some other place cynodem generis with a house or office would have the effect of defeating, not of forwarding, the object of the legislature, and I cannot imagine that, with the desire to suppress that kind of betting mentioned in the preamble, it was in contemplation to afford it a sort of sanctum in a betting ring or in any other place not cynodem generis with a house or office." The mischief intimated in the preamble is the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices, or by other persons acting on their behalf, and the learned judge makes his meaning clear when he begins by saying that "one of the practices deemed to be objectionable and injurious was that which is known as ready-money betting—namely, that the person making the bet deposits with the bookmaker the money which he was disposed to adventure." This is again intimated by construction words which are not there—the words of the statute are "owners or occupiers of such houses or offices." I certainly should have thought that if this case were to be argued upon the preamble alone, there was not much room for doubt, with the actual enacting words, however, I have myself endeavoured to deal —p. 400

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—It was contended that the decision in Stoddart v. Sagar is an authority against the view we are now taking, but I do not so regard it. I agree that it would have been possible for the alderman to have drawn the same conclusion of fact as was found in this case. But that the Court did not draw that conclusion is clear from the judgment of my brother Wright, who said: "No doubt it is possible that under certain circumstances such a competition as this may be a betting transaction, for a case can be suggested where the facts might be so found as to show that it was 'for instance,' and then, although it is quite true that he quotes the words of the section, it is plain he did not feel himself justified, on the facts stated, in drawing the conclusion which Channell, J. has drawn in the case before us. I read that judgment of Wright, J. as reserving for further consideration the point which has arisen in this case. As regards Reg. v. Hobbs, I agree that there are expressions of great authority of the late J.C.J., to which our attention has been called, as to whether in that particular case the contingency might be said to depend on the result of horse races. There is, however, a broad distinction between that case and the present, and I cannot help thinking that that must have weighed with the Court. There was there no promise by the defendant to pay any money to anybody. No money was paid to the defendant in the proper sense of the word. He was the custodian of the money, because if he had made away with it he would have been guilty of improper conduct. But he was only the custodian of the money that other people subscribed. Caminada v. Hulton, which was referred to in Stoddart v. Sagar, may, I think, clearly be distinguished, for the reasons which have been given by more than one member of the Court in the course of the argument. [It had been pointed out that as the competitor in that case got a book, it could not be said that he paid his money only in consideration of the defendant's promise to pay him the prize.]—p. 193.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—After considering Reg. v. Stoddart I do not think that sect 7 [of the Betting Act, 1853] should be so limited in its effect as it was held to be in Stoddart v. Argus Printing Co. The wording of the enactment is incompatible with such a limitation, and it would serve no useful purpose so to limit its operation, the evil of advertising places used as a means for receiving money for betting purposes being as great as that of advertising places used for betting with persons resorting thereto.—p. 568.

Held that upon the true construction of sect. 6 of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860, a gas company is prohibited from furnishing to a customer a supply of gas for the purpose of consumption by him within a district assigned to another company, notwithstanding that the meter through which the supply passes is on a part of the customer's property which is within the district; and distinguished above case on the grounds that there the supply to the customer, the G. W. Ry., was furnished under a contract entered into prior to the Act of 1860, and therefore protected by sect. 51 of the Act, that the question whether the railway would violate the Act if it supplied gas to a hotel built and demised by it had not been decided in that case, and that all that had been decided was that in the circumstances there was no ground for an injunction.

KELLY, C.B.—I do not think that we are called upon, at present, to say whether we should overrule the case of Irons v. Smallpiece, or whether a gift, not made by deed, and unaccompanied by transfer, is invalid in point of law. Whenever that question shall come before me, I feel bound to say I shall require a much higher authority than the note of an obiter (see 2 M. & G. 379, n.), however learned or eminent, to induce me to overrule a decision of Lord Tenterden and his brethren in the Court of Queen's Bench. With regard to the text books which have been cited, they are founded upon cases to which they expressly refer, which contain nothing whatever to support the proposition in the form in which it is laid down. They only give the example of the case in Noy (Flowers' Case), which is quoted as showing that personal property may pass by way of gift without delivery. But it is not said how the gift was made.—p. 129.

POLLOCK, B.—The modern law on the subject is founded on Lord Tenterden's judgment in Irons v. Smallpiece. I can only say that case has been before the Courts on the Common Law side of Westminster Hall for a great many years, and I cannot myself acquiesce in the view of the law there laid down. I am not bound by that decision, because Palke, B., afterwards Lord Wensleydale, in the case of Ward v. Andland, not merely dissented from that proposition, but distinctly expressed his opinion that it was not law. That was so clearly, also, the opinion of so eminent a judge as Maule, J., in the case of Lunn v. Thornton (1 C. B. 379), that I think I may take it now that the true view of the law is thus.—The question to be determined is not whether there has been an actual handing over of property manually, but whether, looking at all the surrounding circumstances of the case, and looking particularly at the nature and character of the chattel which is proposed to be given, there has or has not been a clear intention expressed on the part of the donor to give, and a clear intention on the part of the recipient to receive and act upon such a gift. Whenever such a case should arise again, I am confident that that would be the basis of the decision of a Court of Common Law; and, of course, the same result would follow in a Court of Equity.—p. 580.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The question whether a person who had sold the goodwill of his business was entitled afterwards to canvass the customers of that business came first before the Courts for decision in Labouchere v Dawson. Lord Romilly, M.R., answered it in the negative. . . . In Ginesi v Cooper, Sir George Jessel, M.R., followed the decision in Labouchere v Dawson, and expressed in very strong terms his concurrence with it. . . . but the learned judge went further and expressed a strong opinion that a man who sold the goodwill of his business must not only refrain from soliciting the old customers to deal with him, but must not deal with them. . . . In Leggott v Barrett . . . he acted upon the same view, and extended the injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the customers of the old firm. From this judgment there was an appeal, but the appellant confined his appeal to that part of the order which restrained him from dealing with the customers of the old firm. The C. A. dissolved that part of the injunction of which the appellant complained. . . . The case is chiefly important for present purposes in so far as it discloses the view taken by the learned judges who on that occasion constituted the C. A. on the point now under consideration. In Barrow v. Pearson, to which I shall have occasion to refer immediately, Cotton, L.J. stated that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson was doubted in Leggatt v. Hurrett by James, L.J. and himself. This is no doubt correct so far as Cotton, L.J. is concerned, but I am unable to find any very clear indication that this was the view of James, L.J. . . . The impression produced upon my mind by the whole of the judgment is that the learned judge had not arrived at the conclusion that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrong. Brett, L.J. expressed a decided approval of that decision. . . . The next case in which the matter was brought under consideration of the C. A. was that of Walker v. Mottram. . . . Of the L.J. who then constituted the Court, Baggallay, L.J. expressed a strong doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson. He said that it appeared to him, as at present advised, that it went far beyond what any of the previous decisions would have sanctioned. Lush and Lindley, L.J.J., the other members of the Court, said that the rule laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson had, it was believed, been recognised and acted upon in practice, and, whatever else might be said of it, the rule was in accordance with the general opinion of what was fair and right, and was easily applied in practice. In Pearson v. Pearson the question came again before the C. A. The facts were there less favourable to the plaintiff than in Labouchere v. Dawson, and Baggallay and Lindley, L.J.J. both considered that, even if Labouchere v. Dawson was rightly decided, the case then before them was not governed by it. Baggallay and Cotton, L.J., however, distinctly rested their judgments on the ground that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson was wrong, and ought to be overruled. Lindley, L.J., on the other hand, was of opinion that it was rightly decided. The reason of Baggallay, L.J., for dissenting from Labouchere v. Dawson, so far as it is disclosed by the report of his judgment, appears to be that it went beyond a number of decisions of a higher Court, and, as he thought, without sufficient reason. Even assuming that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson went beyond previous decisions, this does not seem to me to afford any indication that it was wrong, unless it can be shown that it was in conflict with the principles involved in those earlier decisions. Cotton, L.J., examined the earlier decisions, and arrived at the conclusion that Lord Eldon was against the notion that the vendor of the goodwill of a business was, in the absence of express contract, to be restrained from carrying on a similar business in the way in which he might lawfully carry it on if there had been no sale of the goodwill. The learned L.J. pointed out that Lord Romilly rested his decision in Labouchere v. Dawson on the principle that a man could not derogate from his grant. "But," he said, "it is admitted that a person who has sold the goodwill of his business may set up a similar business next door, and say that he is the person who carried on the old business; yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customer from going to the old place. I cannot see where to draw the line. If he may, by his acts, invite the old customers to deal with him and not with the purchaser, why may he not apply to them and ask them to do so? I think it would be wrong to put such a meaning on 'goodwill' as would give a right to such an injunction as has been granted in the present case." I propose now to examine the other authorities. I may state at once, however, that I can find nothing in them inconsistent with the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson. It no doubt went beyond them, inasmuch as it dealt with a question not determined by them, but this seems to me to be no demerit, nor to afford any indication that it was wrong. The earliest case which has any bearing upon the point is that of Cruickshank v. Lye, before Lord Eldon. . . . The importance of the case consists in the definition which Lord Eldon gave of the goodwill there sold. He said, "The goodwill which has been the subject of the sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Fraud would form a different consideration; but if that effect was prevented by no other means than those which belong to the fair course of improving a trade in which it was lawful to engage, I should, in imposing it, carry the effect of my injunction to a much greater length than any decision has authorised, or imagination even suggested." These observations were much relied on by Cotton, L.J., in Pearson v. Pearson. If the language of Lord Eldon is to be taken as a definition of goodwill of general application, I think it is far too narrow, and I am not satisfied that it was intended by Lord Eldon as an exhaustive definition. "Goodwill," I apprehend," said Wood, V.-C. in Churton v. Douglas, "must mean every advantage, every possible advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the late partner not carrying on the business himself, that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business." The learned V.-C. pointed out in this connection that it would be absurd to say that when a large wholesale business is conducted, the public are mindful whether it is carried on in Fleet Street or the Strand. The question what is meant by "goodwill" is, no doubt, a critical one. Sir George Jessel, discussing in Guise v. Cooper the language of Wood, V.-C. which I have just quoted, said, "Attracting customers to the business is a matter connected with the carrying on of it. It is the foundation of that connection which has made the value of the thing that the late firm sold, and they really had nothing else to sell in the shape of goodwill." He pointed out that, in the case before him, the connection had been formed by years of work. The members of the firm knew where to sell the stone; and he asks, "Is it to be supposed that they did not sell that personal connection when they sold the trade or business and the goodwill thereof?" The present M.R. took much the same view as to what constitutes the goodwill of a business. I cannot myself doubt that they were right. It is the connection thus formed, together with the circumstances, whether of habit or otherwise, which tend to make it permanent, that constitutes the goodwill of a business. It is thus which constitutes the difference between a business just started, which has no goodwill attached to it, and one which has acquired a goodwill. The former trader has to seek out his customers. The latter has a custom ready made. He knows what members of the community are purchasers of the articles in which he deals, and are not attached by custom to any other establishment. What obligations, then, does the sale of the goodwill of a business impose upon the vendor? I do not think they would necessarily be the same under all circumstances. I think it must be treated as settled that whenever the goodwill of a business is sold the vendor does not by reason only of that sale, come under a restriction not to carry on a competing business. This is really the strong point in the position of those who maintain that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrongly decided. Cotton, L.J. says [see quotation, supra, col 1189]. I quite feel the force of this argument, but it does not strike me as conclusive. It is often impossible to draw the line and yet to be perfectly certain that particular acts are on one side of it or the other. It does not seem to me to follow that because a man may, by his acts, invite all men to deal with him, and so, amongst the rest of mankind, invite the former customers of the firm, he may use the knowledge which he has acquired of what persons were customers of the old firm, in order, by an appeal to them, to seek to weaken their habit of dealing where they have dealt before, or whatever else binds them to the old business, and so to secure their custom for himself. This seems to me to be a direct and intentional dealing with the goodwill and an endeavour to destroy it. If a person who has previously been partner in a firm sets up in business on his own account and appeals generally for custom, he only does that which any member of the public may do, and which those carrying on the same trade are doing already. It is true that those who were former customers of the firm to which he belonged, many of them on a second transfer their custom to him, but this incidental advantage is unavoidable, and does not result from any act of his. He only conducts his business in precisely the same way as he would if he had never been a member of the firm to which he previously belonged. But when he specifically and directly appeals to those who were customers of the previous firm, he seeks to take advantage of the connection previously formed by his old firm, and of the knowledge of that connection which he has previously acquired to take that which constitutes the goodwill away from the persons to whom it has been sold, and to restore it to himself. It is said, indeed, that he may not represent himself as a successor of the old firm, or as carrying on a continuation of their business; but this, in many cases, appears to me of little importance, and of small practical advantage, if canvassing the customers of the old firm were allowed without restraint. I do not think that in cases where an injunction was granted in terms employed in Labouchere v. Dawson there would be any real difficulty in drawing the line and determining whether there had been a breach of it or not.—pp. 3-8.

STIRLING, J.—In point of decision neither of these cases governs that before me [viz., the case of a sale by one of two partners of all his interest in the assets to the other, goodwill not being expressly mentioned]. Gray v. Smith (post, col 2061), does not, for it related to the use of a trade name and not to the canvassing of customers. It is, however, an authority in favour of the defendant to this extent, that it decides that a contract for the sale of assets generally does not always confer on a purchaser the same rights as one in which goodwill is specifically mentioned. Neither again does Pearson v. Pearson, for all the learned judges relied on the terms of the clause, no equivalent to which is found in the agreement with which I have to deal. It appears, however, to be an authority in favour of the plaintiff in so far as it contains expressions of opinion by the majority of the Court, that under a clause not substantially differing from the agreement before me the defendant was not entitled to canvass customers, while the third (Cotton, L.J.) apparently was not of this opinion.—p. 195.

ROMER, J.—And while referring to that case (Jennings v. Jennings), I desire to add a few observations on the point mentioned by Stirling, J., which occasioned him some doubt. In cases of sale of a business by the Court for the purpose of winding-up a partnership, it has been the practice to provide by the particulars of sale that the sale would not prevent the persons previously interested in the business, or their representatives, from carrying on a like business. But that provision is inserted whether the dissolution of partnership occurs by death of a partner or in the lifetime of all the partners. The reason of its insertion is to prevent a purchaser being misled into supposing that he is buying, or that the vendors are going to sell to him, anything beyond what would be implied by the law by an assignment of the goodwill of the business. *See the observations of Turner and Knight Bruce, L.J., in Johnson v. Killeley [81 L. J. Ch. 179]. The provision is not intended to give any right to the partners or their representatives (as appropriate to themselves the benefit of the goodwill which has to be sold. It merely points out, so as to prevent any mistake or misunderstanding, that the sale of goodwill of a business does not itself prevent vendors from carrying on a like business; but the provision does not provide, and is not intended to provide, that the like business may be carried on by the vendors in a manner incompatible with their position as vendors (p. 187). With regard to Pearson v. Pearson, also referred to by Stirling, J. in Jennings v. Jennings. I think it is clear that the parties must have intended that the defendant should be authorised to carry on business in the same way as any stranger might do; and certainly that was the view which was taken by the C.A., and upon which its decision was based—p. 188.

GOULDEN-HARDY, J.—It has been argued with great force by the defendant's counsel that in Pearson v. Pearson there were two points decided, and that the present case comes within the second point which was not dealt with or overruled in the House of Lords [in Trego v. Hunt]. The point is this: It is argued that there is an express proviso here that the sale of the goodwill is not to prevent either partner from starting a similar business in the neighbourhood after the expiration of the partnership. The first observation which arises is that, if that proviso were omitted, would there have been anything to prevent either partner from starting a similar business at the expiration of the partnership? Certainly not. Trego v. Hunt, which decided that you could not select the customers, also decided that it was too late to hold that the vendor of the goodwill could not carry on the same business in the same neighbourhood. I think, therefore, that the proviso really does not do anything more than express that which would have been implied if it had not been expressed. Then it is argued that that is inconsistent with Pearson v. Pearson. . . . On the construction of those two clauses [of the agreement in that case] all three

A cab does not become any other than a hackney carriage though plying for hire in a railway station. I do not wish to throw any doubt upon the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; but, if the matter were new it might be worth while to consider whether a hackney carriage might not be a stage carriage if passengers were carried at separate fares, and so brought by implication within the earlier part of sect. 4 of the Act.—

CAMPBELL, L.C.—In the celebrated case of Reg. v. Mills, which was an appeal from a judgment holding that by the common law of England a valid marriage could not be contracted without the presence of a priest canonically ordained, the question having been put that the judgment be reversed there was an equality of votes of the peers who were present and took part in the decision. The question the House affirmed the judgment, deciding that by the common law of England a valid marriage could not be contracted without the presence of a priest canonically ordained. I by no means concurred in that decision, thinking that the common law of England accorded with the canon law upon this subject which prevailed over the whole of the Western Church till the Council of Trent, and that a valid marriage might be contracted by the solemn assent of the contracting parties, as Lord Stowell had often laid down, and for fifty years had been considered clear law in Westminster Hall. But subsequently, when presiding as C.J. of the Court of Q. B., I several times, with the approbation of my brother judges, ruled that the question as to the validity of such marriages was settled by the decision of the H. L. in Reg. v. Mills, and if this question were again to be mooted in the House upon an appeal, I conceive that this House would be bound to decide that such a marriage was always null and void, although every peer present should be of opinion that Reg. v. Mills was improperly decided, and that in England, till Lord Hardwicke's Act, the presence of a priest was as little necessary for making a binding marriage contract, as a binding contract of hiring and service.—p. 531

JONES, P. (In the absence of any argument contra) said: The judgment of PAKE, B. in Catherwood v. Caslon satisfies me that the effect of the decision in *Reg. v. CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Whether a marriage actually took place during the lifetime of C. L., on the cohabitation of the parties was merely an adulterous intercourse without any marriage ceremony, the appellant contends that, beginning in an illicit connection, the presumption of subsequent marriage from the continuance of it altogether ceases, and that nothing short of proof of actual marriage, or of such a total change in the character of the cohabitation as will amount to habit and repute of a marriage, will be sufficient to establish the respondent's title. . . . A great number of cases were cited in support of this proposition of the appellant, but those mainly relied upon were Cunningham v. Cunningham and Lapsley v. Grieson. . . . Upon the facts of the case [Cunningham v. Cunningham] Lord Eldon's remarks are pointed out and pertinent, but were clearly not intended for general application. His lordship said "When the cohabitation of a man and woman was not known to have been in its origin illicit, presumption was that it was lawful. But where it was HANNEN, P.—I there held that a colonial law prohibiting the marriage of the guilty party so long as the other remained unmarried did not operate as a bar to re-marriage where the guilty party had acquired a domicile in this country. The distinction between that case and the present is, that there the incapacity to re-marry imposed by the colonial law only attached to the guilty party. It was, therefore, penal in its character, and, as such, was inoperative out of the jurisdiction under which it was enacted. A case to a similar effect, and based on the same principle, was cited from an American report—Poussard v. Johnson, 2 Blatchford 51.—p. 90.

Murray v. Milner (1873) 12 Ch. D. 845; 48 L. J. Ch. 776, 41 L. T. 218, 37 W. R. 881. SERV. J.—It has been argued that the will is not capable of being looked at as a declaration by the deceased father of the claimant, because it is said you must either admit the marriage before you can show that there is any relationship between the declarant and the claimant, or you must deny the existence of the relationship, and then it would be the declaration of a mere stranger. In my judgment that argument cannot prevail. It would lead to great difficulty. As long ago as Goodright v. Moss, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1777, it was determined that general declarations are good evidence after the death of a parent to prove that a child was born before marriage. In that case the Court of Q. B. applied the rule, and Lord Mansfield pointed out that declarations of parents in their lifetime were admissible, and said, "I have known advice given to a father and mother to make attested declarations in writing, under their hand, of the precise time of the birth of the bastard child and the subsequent marriage, to prevent controversy in the family touching the inheritance. If the credit of such declarations is impeached, it must be left to the jury to judge of," clearly holding that such declarations are admissible.—p. 849.

HALL, V.-C.—I am of opinion that I cannot treat the decision in Rideout's Trusts, In re, as bearing the construction which Mr Penison has contended for. A very important question is raised here, and looking at that case—the arguments, dates, and the affidavits which were read—the learned judge did not, as I conceive he would have done in express terms if the old rule had prevailed, exclude those affidavits, but his judgment was clearly to the effect that the law did not exclude a great portion of the evidence of the husband, and, therefore, though I cannot say that the decision in that case altered the law in that respect, yet the learned judge seems to have considered that the law may have been altered, though, having regard to the old rule, he did not act upon the alteration further than this—that he treated the evidence as admissible, but not to be acted upon unless corroborated by other evidence.—p. 447.

MARTIN, B.—As to Laurence v. Trenton, except it be explicable in the manner suggested by Lord Campbell, in his judgment in this case, namely, that time was not of the essence of the contract, or that the law relating to holding intercourse with persons affected by the plague (see 1 Jac. 1. c. 41) made the performance of the contract illegal, I cannot agree with it. It is, no doubt, referred to in several books of authority, but, unless explained as above, it seems contrary to the rule of law [that when a person by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his conduct].—p. 60.

The majority of the Ex. Ch. agreed with MARTIN, B.

COLLINS, L.J. (for self, ALVERSTONE, M.R. and RIGBY, J.J.)—Peers were, no doubt, plaintiffs in suits for jactitation as often as other persons; yet, if the right here claimed existed, they had a much simpler remedy. Indeed Hawke (Lord) v. Corri is a good illustration of this. There, in a suit brought by Lord Hawke for jactitation of marriage, the opponent called himself Lady Hawke, she set up a case of marriage which she, however, abandoned, and rested her defence on the fact that Lord Hawke had at one time consented to her bearing the title. This was held by Sir W. Scott to negative malice on her part, and the suit failed. The experienced counsel, arguing for Lord Hawke before Sir W. Scott, are reported to have said, in excusing their client for proceeding after his former conduct to the lady (p. 284): "A suit of jactitation was the only remedy by which the party could protect himself and his family, from such an assumption of a false relation to himself and to them." This is more than negative evidence.—p. 124.

LORD LINDLEY.—In 1897 the Countess Cowley obtained a divorce from her husband; but, although the divorce dissolved her marriage, it did not determine her life estate in the peerage which she had already acquired. There is no principle of common law, nor is there anything in the Divorce Act, which produces any such result. Fendall v. Goldsmid goes far to show that so far as name is concerned the countess was entitled to continue after the divorce to use the name and style which she had previously acquired the right to use.

Speaking generally, the law of this country allows any person to assume and use the name, provided its use is not calculated to deceive and to inflict pecuniary loss. The law on this subject will be found examined in a very instructive note from the pen of the late Mr. Waley in 3 Dav. (Cour., part 1 (2nd ed.), p. 283. The judgments of Tindal, C.J. in Davies v. Lowndes and of the P. C., delivered by Sir R. Phillimore in Da Boulay v. Da Boulay leave no doubt about it. Sir R. Phillimore, in Da Boulay v. Da Boulay, stated that, "In this country we do not recognise the absolute right of a person to a particular name to the extent of entitling him to prevent the assumption of that name by a stranger." Then, after alluding to trade names, the judgment continues: "The mere assumption of a name, which is the patronymic of a family, by a stranger who had never before been called by that name, whatever cause of annoyance it may be to a family, is a grievance for which our law affords no redress"—p. 88.

JESSEL, M.R.—I now come to consider the only case that was cited by Miss Besant. That is Brown v. Brown. That case was very different as regards dates from this. Now, I must say that this case was decided before the learned judge had decided Marshall v. Marshall. He does not seem to have taken into consideration the fact that the wife had a complete answer to a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights—it had not then been decided that she had, and perhaps that is the reason he did not consider it. But he seems to have considered that the husband had so misconducted himself that he was not entitled to rely upon the agreement for separation, and that, therefore, the wife was also entitled to repudiate it. But with the greatest respect for the learned judge, the repudiation of the deed of separation means, I suppose, the right to return to cohabitation, and if so—if that must be the voluntary act of the wife—it does not appear to me possible that she can say that she is in dread, or that there is any danger. He seems to have omitted from his consideration the foundation of the law, which was the apprehension of danger on the part of the wife, as in Marshall v. Marshall she could not be in any danger at all.—p. 616. And see post, col. 1207.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Hunt v. Hunt is the only case in which an injunction has been granted at the suit of a wife to restrain a husband from carrying on his suit for restitution of conjugal rights, the husband having covenanted not to endeavour to compel the wife to cohabit with him by any legal proceedings. An appeal to this House from that decision was fully argued; and everything which fell from the law lords (except Lord Westbury), in an unusually strong House, was favourable to the appellant; as I myself know, from having signed the case. But Lord Westbury persuaded the House to put some question to the judges, and meanwhile the husband died, so that the case came to an end. Sir G. Jessel seems to have followed that authority in Besant v. Wood (p. 421). Bateman v. Ross (Convent) (post, col. 1240), Wilson v. Wilson (supra), Fauntleroy v. Fauntleroy (post, col. 1242), and Besant v. Wood, were all cases of agreements for separation, all, except the last, founded on compromise of suits, and the last was treated by the late M.R. as virtually for the prevention of a suit, which, whether rightly or not he regarded as the same thing. . . . The late M.R. cannot have intended by the language which he used in Besant v. Wood to affirm the doctrine that the wife was to be regarded as a feme sole in such an absolute sense as to give her an unqualified power to contract with her husband, on the occasion of such a compromise, concerning her real or personal estate, in a manner in which she could not contract for any consideration with any other person.—pp. 430, 431.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question came again before Sir G. Jessel in Besant v. Wood. I think that his reasoning cannot be shaken, that where a wife has power to sue her husband she must have power to compromise any such proceeding, or to bind herself to abstain from taking it. There is nothing in Cahill v. Cahill (supra) to destroy the authority of Besant v. Wood. So far as the decision in that case goes, there is only a warning against carrying the principle further. Until the H. L. declares the law to be otherwise, we must proceed on the view that a contract by a married woman not to sue for restitution of conjugal rights can be enforced against her.—p. 196. FREY, L.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think that this case is not governed by Field v. Field to the extent to which the learned judge held it to be. That case differs from the present in more respects than one. In the first place the letter there was nothing more than a lawyer's letter. In the next place the present appellant expressed what we were unable to find in the letter in Field v. Field—he desired to return to cohabit with her husband. Thirdly, it appears in the present case that the husband received the letter and answered it immediately with an unqualified refusal to take his wife back; whereas in Field v. Field, there was no proof that he had ever received the letter—p. 49

Parkinson v. Parkinson (1869) L. R. 2 P. 25, 39 L. J. Mat. 14, 21 L. T. 732.

LORD PENZANCE.—The question then is, whether a woman who voluntarily enters into an agreement that her husband shall live apart from her, can be said to have been deserted without just cause. I repeat the opinion I formed in Crabb v. Crabb, that she cannot. There is a material difference between such a case as this and Nott v. Nott. The ratio decidendi in Nott v. Nott was, that the wife never agreed to live separate from the husband. The making of a deed was contemplated, and some of the parties executed it, but the party whose execution was to make it an efficient and binding agreement was the trustee who covenanted for the wife, and he never signed it, so that the deed was never completed. In this case the Court is voluntarily obliged to hold that the wife has bargained away her right to relief on the ground of desertion, and that the charge of desertion without cause for two years is not established.—P. 27.

Huxtable v. Huxtable (1899) 68 L. J. P. 83.—JEUNE, P.—It is not an uncommon thing to find that Reg. v. Leresche has not been properly understood. The circumstances of life, such as business duties, domestic service, and other things, may separate husband and wife, and yet, notwithstanding, there may be cohabitation. In giving judgment in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald Lord Penzance said, "I once, then, to the following conclusions as applicable to cases of this kind. No one can 'desert' who does not actively and wilfully bring to an end an existing state of cohabitation. Cohabitation may be put an end to by other acts besides that of actually quitting the common home. Advantage may be taken of temporary absence or separation to hold aloof from a renewal of intercourse. This done wilfully, against the wish of the other party, and in execution of a design to cease cohabitation, would constitute 'desertion.'" This is a true statement of the law, but it must not be taken to mean that cohabitation necessarily implies the daily and nightly residence together of the husband and wife. This was pointed out by this Court as recently as the year 1897 in Bradshaw v. Bradshaw—p. 85. BARNES, J. concurred.

v. Durant, Sir was successfully adultery subsequent to the established condonation was proved, expresses an opinion which is, no doubt, a weighty authority, though not a decision. He went very far in his language. He says (p. 761), "If nothing but clear proof . . . cruelty will revive adultery." If this language is to be taken without qualification, and followed to its logical result, it would follow that, however long a spouse had, after condoned adultery, lived chastely and in full performance of all that a spouse should do, any lapse, however slight and venial in itself, from duty, revived the old adultery, and obliged, or at least enabled, the Court to decree a separation. This does not seem to me either just or expedient, I doubt if it was meant. No case in the Ecclesiastical Courts was cited in which the ground of complaint was not one which was, from its nature, capable of being aggravated by the plaintiff, though condoned, adultery, and in most, if not all, it was so grave that it might well be a ground for separation, even if not so aggravated, and in Dent v. Dent, to be noticed later, it was such cruelty as, without adultery, would have entitled the petitioner to a divorce à mensâ et thoro (p. 237). . . In Dent v. Dent the wife petitioned on account of adultery and cruelty. The husband pleaded condonation of the cruelty. On the final issue was admitted there had been adultery.

present case is sexually distinguishable from Pizzala v Pizzala. There the husband was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman, but not in the matrimonial home, and refused to break it off, although his wife told him that unless he did so she must leave him. The wife then left him, and he continued to live with the woman for over two years. The President held the husband guilty of desertion. These cases all appear to me to have been decided in accordance with the principles shortly stated above, and no distinction has been made whether the adulterous intercourse was carried on in the matrimonial home or elsewhere—p. 115.

taken place in 1861, there is evidence that in 1864 the husband was guilty of cruelty. If you are satisfied of that fact, you will find that though the wife did pardon the husband's adultery there was subsequent cruelty committed which revived that adultery. The cruelty must have been within the 27th section, 'such cruelty as, without adultery, would have entitled her to a divorce à mens et thoro.' This is, I think, the only case reported in which the doctrine of revival has been made the ground on which a divorce à mens et thoro has been granted, and the strong objection arising from its varying the status of married persons does not seem to have been brought to the notice of the learned judge. In Blanford v. Blanford, there had been adultery and desertion; there had been a forgiveness of both that adultery and of the desertion, and a resumption of conjugal intercourse for a few months; after which the adultery with the same person was resumed; there was no condonation of that latter adultery, and the question was whether it could be coupled with the previous desertion, though that desertion had ceased before the adultery complained of was committed. This seems to me a very different question from that involved in Dent v. Dent. But it is to be observed that the judge ordinary, Sir J. Hannen, seems to express approbation of the doctrine laid down in the dictum in Durant v. Durant—p. 240.

words were uttered by that learned judge, because they are wholly inconsistent with the tenor of the rest of his judgment, but as they are attributed to him in this report I think it right to say, that so far as my judgment extends, that is not the law, and that it would be a disgrace to the law if it were so. If a husband knowing the tendency and the evil habit of the wife—misled by the expression—"let the licentiousness of the wife take its full scope" without reproof or interference, I hold that he would never obtain any remedy in a Court of Justice. In subsequent cases a very different rule is represented [His Lordship then dealt with the subsequent cases]—p 165 was relied on; but that is not a very satisfactory authority on which to decide an important question of law, because it is the report of a summing-up to a jury, in which the learned judge would be more diffuse than in giving judgment, and might very possibly use expressions which did not convey his precise meaning.

Besides, the question in that case was whether there had been collusion between the petitioner and the co-respondent and other persons. The allegation in the answer was that "the petitioner, in collusion with the co-respondent and with divers other persons, in or about the month of October, 1860, procured the defilement of the respondent by the co-respondent, which is the adultery (if any) alleged in his petition", and it was in reference to that allegation that the learned judge made the following observations upon which the petitioner relies:—"On the part of the respondent . . . that would not affect the petitioner's case." If by these observations the learned judge merely intended to convey that it was not a necessary result of the evidence that the petitioner was acting in collusion with the co-respondent, that may be so; but I desire to state distinctly and broadly, in order that, if I am wrong, I may be corrected by a Court of liberty to set the licentiousness of the wife take its full scope." I cannot believe that these LINDLEY, L.J. (after having discussed the cases at law and in equity as to the custody of infants) continued: "It was there [Ryder v. Ryder] decided that the Court had no jurisdiction to make any order as to the custody of children over sixteen. The main ground for this decision appears to have been that Courts of Common Law did not make orders disposing of the custody of children over sixteen, and the Divorce Court had not the children before it, and could not therefore enforce against them any order it might make. This reason does not appear to me satisfactory. The Divorce Court could decide as between the parents which parent should have the custody of the children. And even if the Divorce Court could not bring the children before it and exercise jurisdiction over them, still, if the Divorce Court had made an order binding on the parents, such an order might, if necessary and proper, have been enforced by proceedings in Chancery. The effect of Ryder v. Ryder practically was to enable a delinquent father to set up the age of his infant child as an answer to an application for an order for its custody. This was, in my opinion, an unfortunate decision, but it is one from which the Judicature Acts, in my opinion, set us free. It was also wrong to hold as a matter of law that maintenance followed custody and that the Court had no jurisdiction to order maintenance for a child over sixteen. This was decided in Webster v. Webster, although Willes, J., in Ryder v. Ryder, had pointed out that it did not follow from that decision that maintenance could not be ordered for a child over sixteen. Even before the Judicature Act, 1873, the cases, in my judgment, went too far. But after that Act I confess my inability to understand how it can be right to hold that the statutory discretion conferred upon the Court is restricted within the narrow limits previously supposed. And, in Benyon v. Benyon an allowance was made for a child until twenty-four. However, in Blanford v. Blanford the late President (Sir C. Butt) distinctly held that the Court had no power to make an order as to the custody or maintenance or education of a child who was over sixteen years of age. The attention of the President does not, however, appear to have been called either to the Judicature Act, 1873, or to Agar-Ellis, In re (1885) 55 L. J. Ch. 10, 24 Ch. D. 317.—C. A. See "INFANTS," post, col. 1230 and his decision, in my judgment, was an error. In the present case the learned President has simply followed Blanford v. Blanford, which he considered to be binding on him.—p. 142.

COTTON, L.J.—It was contended that in Miller v. Miller the order of sequestration was only against the separate estate of a married woman as to which there was no restraint against antipaction, but we find from the minutes of the order (which have been obtained by the registrar) that that is not so, but that the order and writ were in the same general form as in the present case, and we are told that the practice in the Divorce Court has always been to make the order and issue the writ in that form.—p. 172.

FRY, L.J.—Then it was argued that the sequestration order ought to be confined in the same manner as the judgment in Scott v. Morley ((1887) 57 L. J. Q. B. 43, 20 Q. B. D. 120, post, col. 1287). Now, in the first place, I may observe that Scott v. Morley has really nothing to do with a case of sequestration. This was a case of a judgment for damages, which can be obtained against a married woman only under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act of 1882. . . . But with regard to sequestration, it appears to me that that statute does nothing at all—p. 177.

FRY, L. J.—It is to be borne in mind that not a single case can be found in which a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro has been pronounced in favour of a wife who has been guilty of adultery. Dillon* (supra) expressly dissented from that intimation of opinion on Lord Stowell's part. Since the passing of the Act of 1857 the point has been fully discussed and considered in *Drummond v. JESSEL, M. R.—There was, first, Jessop v. Blake, very soon after the passing of the Divorce Act. [His lordship, having stated the facts of the case, continued.] The judgment was . . . not that the settlement was destroyed, but apparently (for I can only guess) the V.-C. adopted the plaintiff's counsel's argument that it ceased because the dissolution of the marriage was equivalent to the death of the husband. If that were so, it is difficult to see how all the preceding law on the subject could have been right; and it is impossible to see that there is any change in the declaration of trust or the position of the parties, which authorised it. All I can say is that, considering the vast current of authority which existed previously as regards marriages dissolved, I am quite unable to follow these cases which were decided upon the ground that the dissolution of the marriage was equivalent to the death of the husband. The next case is . . .

Swift v. Wiggins. . . The judgment . . . is thus reported in the Law Reports: "Lord Romilly, M.R., considered that the husband had no interest in the trust fund, and made a decree according to the prayer of the bill." I am utterly at a loss to know why. It is a decision without a reason, and it cannot furnish a guiding principle for deciding anything. Whether or not it might be binding in the identical case I am not sure, but my present impression is, that I should not consider it as binding, even in the identical case, under the circumstances. The next is . . . Russell v. Darnley. . . The judgment was in these words: "I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the whole property." Why? I cannot find out at all, but there it is. That is the third decision. I am unable to follow it. . . I am quite unable to say how he [Lord Romilly] distinguished Fewell v. Darnley from Evans v. Carrington—pp 25—27.

 JEUNE, J.—It is true that in that case [Nun- had an English domicile. The learned judge mentioned the fact that the wife, being Scotch originally, acquired her husband's English domicile; but his language appears to show clearly that the principle of his decision was that sect 5 of the 23 & 23 Vict c 61, gave power to vary the settlement, although it was Scotch, and was to be interpreted according to Scotch law.—p. 14.

 BARNES, J.

V. WILLIAMS, L. J.—Farrington v. Farrington, A. v. N. (supra, col. 1221) (a nullity case), and Meredyth v. Meredith are all cases to show that the Court has exercised the power under sect 5 of the [Matrimonial Causes] Act of 1859 in cases when there never had been issue of the marriage. In these cases the point does not seem to have been much, if at all, discussed, but in Wigney v. Wigney (supra, col. 1222), the question was directly raised and argued, and, according to Sir G. Jessel, the amendment contained in the latter section was not expressed in the most artistic way, because, where there were no children of the marriage there could be no person to whom the former section could in terms apply, but what was meant, of course, was that, where there were no children, the persons to be benefited were the divorced husband and wife. This seems a direct decision of the C. A. on the point, it was followed by the C. A. in Pennaby v. Pennaby (supra, col. 1222). . . .

 Now it is said that the jointure rechargé and term could only come into force if the marriage should take effect, and that as the marriage had been declared void it did not take effect, and the jointure rechargé and term cannot come into force, and the settlement was without consideration. Barnes, J. says that Chapman v.
Bradley (supra, col. 1221) and Parsons v. Brown (supra, col. 1223) support these reasons. I agree with Barnes, J. as to the effect of these cases, except that, as a deal does not require consideration, I should rather have said the condition had not happened on which the deal was to take effect than that the deal was without consideration. But I do not agree with Barnes, J. as to the result, for, as I have already said, inasmuch as all marriage settlements are subject to the condition of marriage, if one were to hold that the Court cannot under sect 5 apply settled property for the benefit of the wife and children unless there has been a valid marriage, it would be to hold that the powers of sect. 5 can never be exercised in the case of a decree of nullity, but the section says that the powers may be exercised in such a case. This, in my opinion, by necessary implication gives the Court the power to vary the settlement to this extent.

JEUNE, P.—I am afraid I can hardly deal with this case in the same way as in Meredyth v.
Meredyth. The two cases are distinguishable, because here, if the respondent's life interest is extinguished, as admittedly it should be, the petitioner does not himself acquire an absolute interest, and has not power to dispose of this property. His next-of-kin still would have an interest in the property under the Statute of Distributions, and if I were to destroy their interest, I should be extinguishing the interests of persons entitled to property and whose conduct is in no way impugned. In Meredyth v.
Meredyth I thought that, although Noel v. Noel (supra, col. 1223) showed that the Court will not disturb settlements further than the alteration of circumstances warrants, and will respect the interests of persons whose conduct has not been impugned, still I considered myself justified in going the length of giving the property wholly and absolutely to the petitioner. So in Wynne v. Wynne the wife obtained the whole property. It was only in the event of the wife not disposing of the property that the interests of the next-of-kin would have come into operation in that case—p. 51.

Waite v. Morland (1885) 53 Ch. D. 155, 57 L. J. Ch. 455, 55 L. T. 185, 36 W. R. 484—C. A. COTTON, J.—In Todd, Jave (supra, col. 1221), the property was a reversionary interest on wife which came into possession after the decree for judicial separation, and there it was properly held that she took it as a feme sole. That case has, therefore, no application to the present. Then in Chard and Adams v. Parker, In re (supra, col. 1221), there was a legacy to the wife which became payable before the protection order, but it was not reduced into possession by the husband, and after the protection order the person liable to pay it paid it to the wife; and the M.R. held he was justified in so doing. That is intelligible, but it does not govern the present case. . . . It is not necessary for us to express any opinion upon that decision [Dawes v. Creyke], but there, in fact, the property did come to the wife after the decree, and it does not govern this case. We are not bound by that decision [Cooke v. Fuller], and if it has the effect contended for by the appellants I should decline to follow it. No doubt it was very similar to this case. A wife was deserted by her husband, and afterwards her father bequeathed a fund to her for her separate use without power of anticipation, and she subsequently obtained a protection order. Lord Romilly held that she was entitled to payment of the fund free from the restraint on anticipation. There may have been circumstances that justified the decision, but this case is very shortly reported, and the reasons for the decision are not stated—p. 187.
LINDLEY, J.—That case [Cooke v. Fuller] was not decided under sect. 25 [Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857], but under sect. 21, which has reference to a protection order, and is expressed in different terms.—p. 188. BOWEN, L.J. concurred. And see post.

CORTON, L.J.—The question we have to deal with is whether during the period between the decree nisi and the final decree alimony can be granted. Until the final decree the Court can make no permanent provision for the wife, therefore it seems reasonable that it should have power to make some temporary provision. For this reason, independently of authority, I should come to the conclusion that the order appealed from was right. Latham v Latham is no doubt an authority against it, but that is not binding upon us. If it had been generally followed it might not have been right to disturb the practice. But it is not so. In Laxton v Laxton, the same judge who decided Latham v Latham seems to have doubted its correctness, and said that it ought to be considered again. Laxton v Laxton is an authority for the view that an application for permanent alimony before the final decree is premature. Therefore, I think, we are justified in overruling Latham v Latham—p. 189

CORTON, L.J.—The question is whether Wells v Wells lays down a binding rule that after the verdict of a jury has established the adultery of a wife, she can as a matter of right claim that alimony pendente lite which has been allowed her shall go on till the period during which a new trial can be applied for has expired. In Wells v Wells, there was no motion for a new trial, in the present case a motion for a new trial has been refused. We do not find on inquiry that Wells v Wells has been treated in the Divorce Court as establishing such a general rule as is contended for—that, although the wife has been found guilty, the alimony must go on till the case is finally disposed of. Ellis v Ellis was an entirely different case. The wife there took the proceedings against her husband, and she had in no way forfeited her rights against him. The case was one where it would be proper ultimately to grant permanent alimony, and we thought it reasonable that in the meantime she should have intermediate alimony—p. 92 LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.J.J. concurred

HERSCHEL, L.C.—Under the circumstances of that case [Blackmore v. Mills] it may have been quite right to refuse to grant alimony. But I do not think Lord Penzance meant to lay down that the Court had no jurisdiction to grant alimony in a suit for nullity on the ground that the marriage was void ab initio, if he did, I cannot agree with him. In Bird v Bird, in 1783, Sir G. Lee, the then judge of the Court of Aches, in a suit for nullity of marriage, brought by the husband on the ground that at the time of the marriage the wife had another husband living, a de facto marriage being admitted, held that the husband must bear the expenses of the wife. Sir G. Lee said that, as there was no precedent, he must determine the case upon the general principles of law and reason. And he added, "I must presume, until the contrary appeared in evidence, that she was his wife de jure, as well as de facto, for otherwise she must be guilty of bigamy, and is a felon by stat. of Jac. 1; but the law presumes, on the contrary, everybody to be innocent till they are found guilty. That was, no doubt, the first decision of the kind. But it appears to have become afterwards the settled practice of the ecclesiastical courts to grant alimony to a wife pending suit in all cases of this kind, unless there was some special reason to the contrary.

In my opinion, the practice is in accordance with reason and good sense—p. 312

JEUNE, P.—It was argued before me that the husband's income of 60*l.* a month is a voluntary allowance from his brother, and that, therefore, it ought not to be taken into account in fixing alimony, and reliance was placed on Haviland v Haviland. I was therefore received judgment, because I wished to ascertain by an examination of the authorities and by inquiry whether it has been since the date of that case the practice in the Registry to exclude from then calculations all amounts to which the occupants have no legal claim. I am informed that it has not, but, on the contrary, in many cases such incomes have been taken into calculation. Not only do I think it right that this should be so, but I can easily understand why Haviland v Haviland has not been considered to forbid such a practice.—p. 36.

LORD PENZANCE—Upon the question of the validity of the rules made by the judge ordinary alone, I adhere to what I said in Charles v. Charles. [The judge ordinary read his judgment upon upon this question in that case.] To this I have only to add that I agree with my brother Pigott, that if the 1st section of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144 had been confined to conferring upon the judge ordinary the power of the "full Court" there might be ground for the suggestion that the expression "full Court" was used in a technical sense as meaning the three judges who, before the passing of that statute, sat to hear suits for dissolution and nullity. There was no statutory definition of the full Court, but it consisted of a certain number of judges, of whom it was necessary that three should be present. But the section goes on to say, "or by three or more judges of the said Court." Now, the full Court never consisted of more than three judges. Something more, therefore, was intended than the full Court of three judges. It seems to me, therefore, that under this section also the judge ordinary alone has power to make the rules—p. 350.

Mordaunt v. Moncrieffe (1874) 43 L. J. Mat. 49; 13 R. 2 H. L. (Sc.) 374, 30 L. T. 649, 23 W. R. 12.—H. L. with the Judges, reversing S.C., non. Mordaunt v. Mordaunt: 39 L. J. Mat. 57; 1 R. 2 P. 109, 23 L. T. 85, 18 W. R. 845.—LORD PENZANCE and KEATING, J.; KELLY, CB dissenting.

BRETT, J.—The importance of the decision of Sir C. Cresswell in Bawden v. Bawden is therefore attacked. It was said by the learned counsel at the bar that it was a pauper case, and therefore, probably, any reason was thought sufficient to get rid of the suit. To anyone who knew the late Sir C. Cresswell, his chivalrous honour, his intellectual ardour for right decision in matters of law, and his utter disregard and contempt for superior station of parties in litigation, such an assertion is not merely deplorable, it is, to use the mildest word, futile. The authority of Bawden v. Bawden cannot be diminished one iota by the only refutation of it which has been suggested. Your lordships must deal with that case upon the footing that it was as much a deliberate and carefully-considered opinion as any ever given by that learned and conscientious judge.—p. 55.

KEATING, J. to the same effect.

KELLY, CB.—It may be convenient here to refer to Bawden v. Bawden, in which Sir C. Cresswell, undoubtedly a judge of great learning and high authority, decided that a suit like this could not be proceeded with against a respondent who had become insane. But this decision, if it can be called a decision, was certainly pronounced under circumstances detracting from the weight to which it might otherwise have been entitled. The respondent was a pauper inmate in a workhouse, and the guardian the overseer of the parish. We find no trace of any argument at the bar, and no reasons delivered from the bench. A case was referred to as a supposed precedent, which turns out to have been no decision at all. And if the view which I take of the Act of Parliament, under which this proceeding was instituted, be correct, the case itself stands alone, as an example of a Court taking upon itself to put an end to a suit lawfully instituted, by an arbitrary act, unauthorised by the common law, and directly opposed to the provisions of an Act of Parliament.—p. 61.

LORD CHELMSFORD—Great stress has been laid on the judgment of Sir C. Cresswell in Bawden v. Bawden, and of Lord Penzance in the present case, as proceeding from judges of the highest authority, and more particularly consonant with the procedure of the Divorce Court. But, as the question before your lordships depends entirely upon a judicial construction of an Act of Parliament, those eminent judges cannot derive any peculiar advantage from their experience of the practice of that Court.—p. 65.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I ought not to omit noticing Bawden v. Bawden. The decision there adds the weight of Sir C. Cresswell's opinion to that of the majority of the judges in the present case, and of the judge ordinary, and I admit that weight, and regard his judgment as worthy of all respect, but where no argument could be had on one side the weight of all decisions must be greatly impaired.—p. 70.

BARNES, J.—Since the [Matrimonial Causes] Act of 1866, the question has arisen in three cases. In Grieve v. Grieve and Carew v. Carew persons charged with adultery by the Queen's Proctor sought to intervene, but then applications were refused. I think the ground of those decisions is that there was no power to allow them, as intervention is only permitted in the specific cases, which are provided for under sect. 28 of the [Matrimonial Causes] Act of 1857.

In Wheeler v. Wheeler and Rhodes a person charged, like the applicant, by a respondent with adultery, applied for leave to intervene. In that case the answer, though it did not in terms claim cross-relief against the petitioner, claimed "such further or other relief as to the Court may seem fit," and this being so, the judge held that it was in effect a cross-petition, and allowed the application, basing the decision on this very ground, and as I read his judgment, expressly declining to decide the point raised. My impression is that he thought that the respondent could have been compelled to cite the applicant, and that it did not much matter whether he was cited or allowed to intervene.—p. 59

JENKINS, P.—In Jones v. Jones I am correctly reported as having expressed to Barnes, J. my belief that his judgment was in accordance with the decisions I had previously given in similar cases. The subject has since been under the consideration of the C. A. in Saunders v. Saunders, and I think it desirable to state how I conceive the practice now stands, having regard to the decision of that tribunal, which must of course be followed here. The general effect of sect. 28 of the Act of 1857 has long since been determined. In Pitt v. Pitt Lord Penzance pointed out, and I gather, on the whole, that the same view is adopted by the C. A. in Saunders v. Saunders, that the words "alleged adulterer" do not mean a person charged by name in the petition, but that in every case where adultery is charged there is an alleged adulterer. In other words, where adultery is alleged, ex necessitate rei an adulterer is alleged, though it may be that he cannot be identified with any person, living or dead. It has always appeared to me, therefore, that the mere belief of the petitioner, founded on the insufficiency of the evidence then before him, that a person accused of being the adulterer is not guilty, cannot be sufficient to excuse his being made a co-respondent, because, if so, there would practically never be a call on the Court to exercise its discretion, and I did not understand the language used by the learned judge in Jones v. Jones to state more than this. Of a principle stated with this exact limitation, which can hardly be considered a rule, I do not understand the C. A. to express disapproval. But if the petitioner can go further, and satisfy the Court that no evidence can be obtained against the man accused, then the authority of Saunders v. Saunders shows that there may be a case for relieving the petitioner from making a co-respondent.—p. 2

D CAIRNS, L.C.*—As for the authorities, all those which have been cited in argument are, with one exception, Prole v Soady, unfavorable to the plaintiff's contention, and I do not think that that case affords any support to it, for I am utterly unable to see that it has any real bearing on the question of status. The observations I there used are these: "I am of opinion that according to the Act, it is impossible to hold otherwise than that the order nisi is the decree which the Court eventually makes absolute against the parties. Therefore, I think the order absolute in this case took effect from the date of the order nisi, and that everything done in the interval was subject to the danger of being set aside by the order becoming absolute." And I am of opinion that those observations were correct with reference to the case with which the Court then had to deal. It was not there intended to lay down as a broad rule that in all cases, and for all purposes, the decree, upon being made absolute, relates back to the date of the order nisi. So to construe the above observations is to overlook the important qualifying words "in this case", they must be construed with reference to the particular subject-matter then before the Court. There the question was whether a husband or his assignee could reduce into possession a fund standing in Court to the wife's credit after a decree nisi had been pronounced for the dissolution of the marriage. It is one thing for a Court of equity to refuse to allow a husband, after a decree nisi has been pronounced, to reduce his wife's choses in action into possession, and thereby defeat her right of survivorship, it is quite another thing to say that the decree nisi alters the status of the parties. I am of opinion then that until the legislature otherwise orders, the status of a married woman remains the same until the decree is made absolute.—p. 363 BAGAALLAY, L.J. concurred.

COLLINS, J.—Blackhall v. Blackhall is not in point. The ruling must be read in the light of the circumstances of the case, and the point before the Court at the time. The petitioner had claimed a divorce, the respondent and co-respondent had pleaded connivance; the Queen's Proctor intervened in the interest of the co-respondent to establish connivance between the petitioner and respondent. The co-respondent was not made a party, and Butts, J., did not think he could treat him as a party against whom he could make an order. In this case the Queen's Proctor has intervened, and has charged collusion between the petitioner and co-respondent. He has made the co-respondent a party. He is a party, and I have ample power to deal with him as a party.—P. 85.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.J.J.)—Gandy v. Gandy came twice before the C.A.—first, on one state of facts; and secondly, on another and quite different state of facts. The first decision of Gandy v. Gandy appears to have been greatly misunderstood. [His lordship explained both decisions and continued.] The short result of Gandy v. Gandy may be summed up thus: first, Lord Hannen's decision that continued chastity was an implied condition in separation decrees was overruled; secondly, in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy, the Court held the wife bound by her agreement, there being no circumstances to relieve her from it, and no power in the Divorce Court to disregard her covenant; thirdly, in the second case of Gandy v. Gandy, the wife having the custody of the children and the husband refusing to support them, she was held no longer bound by the covenants in the separation deed; and the Divorce Court being free to disregard it, had power to do what it thought just in making her an allowance in the shape of alimony, and to take into account whatever circumstances it considered material in arriving at a conclusion as to what was just under the altered position of the parties fourthly, nothing was decided respecting any of the statutory powers of the Divorce Courts in suits for dissolution of marriage, fifthly, nothing was decided in the first suit of Gandy v Gandy as to the power of the Divorce Court to make orders respecting the custody, maintenance and education of the children—p 73.

Resumption of Cohabitation

COTTON, J.—We have the authority of Lord Ebbson in Bateman v. Ross (Convent) (supra) that cohabitation and reconciliation put an end to all the effects of separation. This is the general principle. . . . The first case I shall refer to is Randle v. Gould. There was an express agreement in that case that the provision for the wife was to come to an end in the event of the parties agreeing in writing to return to cohabitation, and it was held that as there was a condition respecting the kind of reconciliation which should put an end to the agreement, it excluded the contention that a different kind of reconciliation would have that effect. Undoubtedly there was a dictum of Lord Campbell, who delivered the judgment of the Court, to the effect that even if there had been no such express proviso he could not have held that there was an implied condition that the agreement should be avoided by reconciliation and renewed cohabitation. I doubt whether I should have agreed with the dictum. At all events it is not a decision governing the present case. In Crouch v. Waller there were two deeds, one of which contained an express proviso that it was to be void in case of a renewal of cohabitation, and it was contended that the other deed was avoided also by reconciliation, but it was held that inasmuch as that deed contained a provision for future children of the marriage it must be treated as a post-nuptial settlement which will not come to an end on the termination of the separation. It is true that Randle v. Gould was referred to by the L.C. in that case without disapproval, I think it will, therefore, be right for me to express my disapproval of the dictum of Lord Campbell in Randle v. Gould, lest it should be said hereafter that it was approved of by this Court. Then there was Charlton v. Holt, but that has no bearing upon the present question. In that case it was held that a subsequent divorce dissolving the marriage did not put an end to the wife's rights under a separation deed. . . . Undoubtedly it was there [Negus v. Morley] held that the provisions in a separation deed for the wife's benefit continued though the separation was at an end. But there was no principle there laid down which can bind us to come to any conclusion different from that which I have stated, namely, that this case falls within the general rule. The agreement was made expressly subject to the decree for judicial separation being pronounced.—pp. 526, 528.

BRETT, M.R.—That case [Scholey v. Goodman] is simply a decision as to the old law of pleading; it is not an authority upon any other question—p. 795.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first [question] is whether the adultery of the wife is a defence to the action for the annuity. Now that appears to me to be settled, and to be settled by long authority, both at law and in equity, that it would be wrong for us to disturb that rule, even although we thought it unsound. It has been settled for at least 100 years, as may be seen by tracing the cases back from Seagrave v. Seagrave (supra, col 1241) and Jee v. Thurlow (supra, col 1239). The earliest cases that I need mention are Sidney v. Sidney (supra), decided in 1734, and Blount v. Winter (supra), decided in 1781, in these the matter was discussed, and from the time of these decisions it has not been seriously argued in Courts of either law or equity. I am aware that dicta may be found in the Court of Arches (see Sullivan v. Sullivan) which are not altogether in accordance with the view which has been taken in other cases. But this is a mere action at common law for an annuity due under a deed, and to that action adultery is no answer. That I take to be perfectly settled.—p. 809.

ROMILLY, M.R.—With respect to the jurisdiction of the Court, which is exceedingly important in matters of the description, Vansittart v. Vansittart is constantly referred to, and, although that is an old case, in so far that it was before the statute passed for the regulation of the Court of Divorce under the present system, it was there laid down that if a husband, by a deed or by an agreement in that case it was only an agreement, agreed to abandon all his parental duties, and transfer them to the wife to be performed by her, this Court would not specifically enforce a contract of that description. Then on the other hand, a case afterwards came before me which was unquestionably a case likely to try the principle very strongly—Swift v. Swift—where the father had been guilty of moral turpitude towards his own child, a little girl of seven years old, and thereupon he consented to a deed by which the children were taken away from him and consigned to the mother. He repented of that afterwards, refused to pay anything under that deed, and insisted that he should have possession of the children, upon which the mother instituted a suit to prevent him from so doing. Thereupon I endeavoured to point out that the limit of the jurisdiction must be defined in this manner, that the foundation of the jurisdiction lay in determining what was for the good of society in general, that it was against public policy to allow a father, under ordinary circumstances, to abandon his duties as a parent, and to allow another person to undertake those duties, and that there was no consideration which would be sufficient to enable a father to take that course. But on the other hand, a different and controlling equity arose where the father had shown himself utterly incompetent to perform those duties, and where he had so ill-behaved himself that the interposition of this Court was necessary for the protection of his children, in which case the jurisdiction is constantly exercised by this Court—the children being made wards of Court, and an application to take the children away from the custody of their parent allowed and complied with. And accordingly, in Swift v. Swift, it was urged that the Court would have enforced this equity, and would have prevented the parent from taking the custody of his own children, that in that state of circumstances, if a contract were made which really had for its object, not a violation of public policy by taking away the parental duties, but the enforcement of what was due to public policy by preventing the demoralization of the children by their own father, the Court would interfere at least to that extent. Accordingly, I so held in that suit, and upon appeal my judgment was affirmed by the L J J—p. 519.

Massey v. Bowen (1869) L. R. 4 II. L. 288; 23 L. T. 141.—H.L. (IR.); affirming 19 R. 1 Eq. 110.—C.A. BLACKBURN, L.C. and CHRISTIAN, J. HATHERLEY, L.C.—The word "separate" is sometimes used alone; but if the word "sole" is used, it is never used alone, that I can find, in any book or precedent. Nor has it been attempted to be shown in the present case, as it would have been competent for the parties to show, according to the recognised doctrine in Ray, Ex parte, that the practice of conveyancers has been modelled according to a given construction of the word "sole." The only authorities which require to be noticed upon this subject are, first, Adamson v. Armitage, before Sir W. Grant, which regard being had to the character of that judge, would be undoubtedly a case of very great authority, if we could find the principle clearly established in it, that the word "sole" of itself had the efficacy which has been attributed to it by the appellants. But I think there are two circumstances which militate against that conclusion being drawn from the decision of Sir W. Grant. The one is, that the question which really arose in that case was, whether a life interest of an absolute

Interest had been conferred. And there was there also an interposition of trustees with reference to the sole benefit of the person who was intended to take. And with reference to circumstances in that case which would seem in some respects to have created a life interest alone, except for other passages in the will, it became incumbent on Sir W. Grant to consider whether an interpretation might not properly be put on the word "sole," as there introduced, to this extent, that during the lifetime of the testator, in the case of any after-taken husband (she was not married at the time, but she might have married afterwards), the interest should be applied for his use, she having, nevertheless, a full and complete and beneficial ownership in the whole. Besides that, one cannot help feeling that the case is not to be regarded as a leading case impressing upon the word "sole" this technical meaning, because, in reading Sir W. Grant's judgment, you see that in the conclusion to which he comes he relies upon the whole will, and upon the cases in which it had been held that words of such import as "payment for the wife's own use and benefit," or "payment to her own hands," had received the construction of creating a separate use—words which undoubtedly, since his day, have been held not to have any such effect properly attributable to them. I cannot, therefore, look upon that as a case which has settled and determined the law.

In that case [Killick, Ex parte], undoubtedly, the V.-C. in deciding the case, did throw out some observations strongly tending in the direction contended for by Mr. Williams, but the character of the case itself is such that I think all judges would have concurred in the conclusion which was arrived at, because the character of the limitations showed the intention of excluding the husband from either portion of the property conveyed. That again [Green v. Britten, supra] is a case of a similar description, where the whole purport of the instrument clearly indicated a separation of the interest of the wife from the control and influence of the husband. That being so, on the other hand, we have Gilbert v. Lewis . . . and Lewis v. Mathews . . .

And it appears to me that in those cases the learned judges who decided them had not anything before them which ought to have embarrassed them in coming to the conclusion to which they did come, that the word "sole" was not a technical word. I have referred to the authorities which existed at the time when these decisions took place. Both of those learned judges came to a conclusion which I think will warrant your lordships in saying that if there is any weight to be given at all to the effect to be produced upon the minds of conveyancers and those who have to advise upon instruments of that kind, in consequence of a decision, the only effect would be this, that there is nothing anterior to those judgments which necessarily affixed a technical meaning to this word "sole"—and that those judges, not being embarrassed with any such previous conclusion, have now sufficiently established the contrary proposition.—pp 294—297. Headnote—Property to which at the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a woman married before the Act was entitled subject to a life estate, but not for her separate use, held not to become her separate estate by falling into possession after the commencement of the Act. If a woman married before the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has before the commencement of the Act acquired a title, whether vested or contingent, and whether in reversion or remainder, to any property, such property is not made her separate estate by sect. 5 of the Act, though it falls into possession after the Act.

(There had been considerable difference of opinion among the judges of first instance in the Chancery Division upon the true construction of this sect. 5, but it may now be taken that Heid v. Reid has definitely settled the law on the question, and this being so, that the effect of this decision is to overrule *Baynton v. STIRLING, J.—That [Adam's Policy Trusts, In re (supra)] was a decision that sect. 10 of the [Married Women's Property] Act of 1870, had not been repealed, but that is made more clear by the report of the case in the Law Times Reports. It appears that the petition was entitled, "In the matter of the Married Women's Property Acts, 1870 and 1874, and also in the matter of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852," and counsel suggested that it might be proper to amend the petition if the Court thought it unnecessary that it should be entitled in the latter Acts as well as in the Act of 1870, but that from the wording of sect. 11 of the Act of 1882 it did not appear whether it was intended to apply to a policy effected before as well as to one effected after the passing of the Act, whereupon Chitty, J. remarked that he thought that the Act of 1882 was prospective only, but that the words "shall vest" related only to the future, and, counsel then suggesting that the petition should be amended by striking out the rest of the title, and entitling it only in the Act of 1870, Chitty, J. expressed his concurrence, and I have ascertained that this was done, and the order was actually made under the Act of 1870. Then there was Soutar's Policy Trusts, In re, before Pearson, J., in which Adam's Policy Trusts, In re, does not appear to have been brought to his attention. The counsel used the same argument which has been used with so much effect before Chitty, J., but Pearson, J., said, "I doubt whether sect. 10 of the Act of 1870 remains in force for any purpose, because sect. 11 of the Act of 1882 says that, if at the time of the death of the insured there shall be no trustee, a trustee or trustees may be appointed by any Court having jurisdiction under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1850, or the Acts amending and extending the same." And he directed that the order should be made under all the Acts. I do not, however, read Pearson, J., as doing more than giving an expression of doubt, and I do not take it to be an actual decision.—p. 721.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. — Then we come to the direction that the interest which any female might take under the will should be for her sole and separate use, and without power to anticipate, giving that to her of a sum of money or equivalent to a gift of a pecuniary annuity. And it is consistent with the decision of Bacon, V. C. in Croughton's Trusts, in re, where the gift was held to be equivalent to a gift of a sum of money. With respect to the third case, Clarke's Trusts, in re, I am unable to agree with it. So far as giving the sum of cash to the married woman I think it was right, but I cannot agree with Fry, L. J., so far as he decided that she was entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the stock in Court, because, although formerly an income-bearing fund, it had been converted into cash. It cannot make any difference that a sum of money which was at the testator's death invested on mortgage has been converted into cash. In the present case we have a gift substantially of a sum of cash, although invested at the time. Therefore I think that the party having survived at which this lady is to be considered entitled to the fund, she can give a valid receipt for it, and is entitled to have it paid to her. I also wish to say that I agree with the decision in Sykes's Trusts, in re — p. 420.

COTTON, L. J. — It has long been settled that when money is given to a woman for her separate use, inasmuch as the separate use is a creature of equity, she may be restrained from anticipating the income. Baggett v. Meux decided that it applied not only to a life interest but to separate interest given to a married woman absolutely. — p. 422.

His lordship also disapproved of Clark's Trusts, in re LINDLEY, L. J. concurred.

Bown, in re, followed reluctantly, Spence v. In 16, Thomas v. Spence (1885) 55 L. J. Ch. 80; 30 Ch. D. 183; 54 L. T. 62. — PEARSON, J. explained, Currey, in re Gibson v. Way (1885) L. J. Ch. 806, 32 Ch. D. 361, 54 L. T. 665; 33 W. R. 541. — CHITTY, J. And see post, col. 124.

JESSE, M. R. — Then as to the will of the husband, the question arises whether the will declaring that the defendant is not to have power to "alienate, charge, or anticipate" the income of the 5,000*l.* are of themselves, there being other words that would do so, sufficient to give her a separate estate as against her husband whether these words authorized the Court to draw the inference that the income was intended to be the wife's separate property. Upon this point there is the dictum of Knight Bruce, V. C. [Baggett v. Meux], a very powerful judge and master of this branch of the law, which, although it was not necessary for the decision of that particular case, is part of his considered judgment. He there says, in the most deliberate and explicit terms, that words, similar to those in the will in the present case, prohibiting alienation of property by a married woman, are of no effect unless the property is limited to her separate use. The language of Lord Langdale in Tillot v. Arundel (supra, col 1255) shows that he took precisely the same view.—p 670

COLERIDGE, C.J.—In Bown, In re, it was held that the testator intended the legatees to have the capital paid to them, but in the other case, Grey's Settlements, In re, it was decided that the testator must be taken to have intended the legatees to remain in the hands of the trustees with a restraint on anticipation by the legatees. Both these decisions are, in my opinion, right, and consistent with each other. In Bown, In re, there was a direction to "pay" to the legatee after the death of the tenant for life. This showed the testator's intention to be that the shares of that legatee should then be handed over to her, and the restraint on anticipation was, therefore, held to be confined to the antecedent period. In Grey's Settlements, In re, there were no words showing an intention that the legatees should be paid over, and the restraint on anticipation was held to be general.—p 147.

There was a trust for separate use, not limited in duration, with a special reference to the present husband, and it was held that it did not prevent the trust from applying to a future coverture. In that case [Sturgis v. Corp] there was existing property settled with reference to an existing coverture; and the Court arrived at the conclusion that the lady could dispose of her interest, even though she was not in actual enjoyment of the property. But when I look at the words of the settlement in the case before us, I am of opinion that the trust for separate use applies to a future coverture only.—p 725.

COTTON, L.J.—The case which is most similar to this is Longan v. Williamson, before Bacon, V.-C., in which the judge relied on the fact that the claimant had brought his action as soon as there was any fund out of which he could be paid, because the only property of the married woman was that which she got from her father, and that had only lately been realized. Mr. Fischer sought to make that argument applicable to the present case, and he relied on the fact that the property which passed under the testatrix's will became liable to the claim within six years. But there was property settled to her separate use ever since 1875, which could have been made available. Therefore the ground relied on by Bacon, V.-C. fails in the present case, and I have some doubt whether the V.-C. was right in the reliance he placed on that ground, because the statute begins to run as soon as an action can be brought to enforce the claim, irrespective of there being any property.

Norton v. Turvill is very shortly reported. The lady had a power to appeal by deed or will, and she gave a bond for 25l. Of course, an action could have been brought against her on that bond, but, as I understand the judgment of the M.R., he considered the execution of the bond as an exercise of her power of disposition. . . . The M.R. looked upon the bond, erroneously, as I think, as an execution of the power which the settlement gave her, so that the creditor became creditor quod fructus under it. That seems to be the ground of his judgment. Heatley v. Thomas (supra, col. 1258) does not appear to help in this case, it turns on quite a different point. Then in Vaughan v. Walker the L.C. of Ireland held that the Statute of Limitations did not run against the creditors of a married woman; but the L.J. differed from that view, and I must express my opinion that the L.C. was wrong in the view which he took, and that he did not deal with the liability of the separate estate of a married woman as we ought to deal with it.—p. 688

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that Kay, J. was right in saying that Norton v. Turvill is to be explained by saying that the bond was held to have acted as an appointment making the trustee of the settlement a trustee for the oblique of the bond. But that view is now exploded.—p. 634 LOPES, L.J. concurred.

JAMES, L.J. (for self, SIR D. PEACOCK, MELLISH, L.J. and SIR M. SMITH).—It is true, that in Shattock v Shattock the M.R. expressly overruled the judgment of TURNER, L.J. in Johnson v Gallagher, and held, that even a promissory note given by a married woman living separate and apart from her husband, and having property settled to her separate use for life, with a power to appoint it by will, was not a debt payable out of the property so appointed. In that judgment he bases his dissent from TURNER, L.J. on the ground, that the authorities cited by the latter do not warrant his conclusion. Their lordships are not able to concur in that view of the authorities, and have arrived at the conclusion, that TURNER, L.J.'s judgment is expressed with his usual accuracy. One of the cases, Heatley v Thomas, when carefully examined, is a direct authority for the L.J.'s proposition.—p. 594.

FRY, J.—In those cases declarations had been made declaring that the separate estate of the married woman was charged in the absence of the trustees, and I am not prepared to say that where the trustees cannot be found, as in Collett v Dickenson, that may not be a convenient and very proper course to pursue, but it is a course of great inconvenience as a course which leads to a great deal of, as it seems to me, needless expense; because, when the matter comes back on further consideration in such a state, all the Court can do is to repeat the declaration made at the hearing, reducing to a certainty the amount of the charge, and reducing to a certainty the amount of the separate estate, and then to leave the whole matter to be worked out, if necessary, by subsequent proceedings. The course, therefore, is inconvenient, and I refuse this application with costs.—p. 151.

JAMES, L.J.—The language of the decree in Picard v Hine, which gave the plaintiff a charge upon the separate estate remaining, was intended to give effect to the rule that the creditor had a claim against the estate, but not a charge upon it, so as to prevent the operation of any intermediate alienation, and therefore the inquiry was directed what separate estate remained, meaning only what part remained of that separate estate in respect of which the married woman had at the time of contracting the debt a ius disponendi. That is evidently what was before the Court, no such point having been suggested as that she had acquired the general power of contracting debts to be paid out of any separate estate she might afterwards acquire. The misconception has arisen from not attending to what were the facts of the cases in which that inquiry was directed. I desire to have it distinctly understood as my opinion, and the opinion of my colleagues, and therefore as the decision of this Court, that in any future case the proper inquiry to be made is what was the separate estate which the married woman had at the time of contracting the debt or engagement, and whether that separate estate, or any part of it, still remains capable of being reached by the judgment and execution of this Court. The decision in Johnson v Gallagher was that the debt of the married woman, although she had separate estate, did not prevent her disposing of that separate estate any more than the contracting of a debt prevents a man from disposing of any part of his estate—p. 160

BREKTT, L.J.—Roberts v. Watkins and Sykes's Trusts, In re (supra, col. 1263), are adverse to the case of the plaintiffs, and with those decisions I entirely agree—p. 161

COTTON, L.J.—As regards Godfrey v. Harben, which was pressed upon us, that to some extent favours the contention of the respondents. I think it better not to give any opinion on the point there decided, as it may come to the O.A., but that case went very much farther than the case it was supposed to follow. As I understand that case, the decision was that the power of appointment by will connected with the separate life estate, when exercised, made the appointed property separate property. In London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Leupriere there was power to appoint by deed or will, which makes a great difference between that case and the case before Hall, V.-C. However, I express no opinion upon that case, except to point out that distinction, leaving the case entirely free if and when it comes before the O.A.—p. 166

JAMES, L.J.—I may say as regards Florey v. Buller, and Roberts v. Watkins, that in the former case Denman, J., must be understood as merely following what he thought was the decision of Malins, V.-C. [in Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 14 Ch. D. 837], and the judgment of Lush, L.J. in the latter case seems to me from beginning to end to be expressed with absolute accuracy.—b.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Since this case was argued yesterday I have looked at Glavinell, In re, a little more closely. It appears to me that that case, and the reasoning on which it is based, do not apply to the present case at all. In the first place, in Glavinell, In re, no proceedings had been taken by the lady under the Act [Married Women's Property Act, 1882]. She sued by her next friend. In the second place, there was no order on the married woman to pay the costs in the third place, the order of Bacon, V.-C., which was appealed against, authorised the trustees to retain the costs out of future accruing separate estate—and to that extent it was obviously wrong. But there was this further point raised in that case. There was a small sum of 36l., which was said to be arrears, and it was contended that this might be impounded or retained by the trustees. But when we look at the judgment we find that this small sum of 36l., accrued after the order on further consideration, which did not order her to pay the costs, but ordered her next friend to pay them, and the Court there came to the conclusion that even that sum could not be attached. There is language in the judgment that goes the length of intimating an opinion that the only arrears that could be attached were arrears that had accrued at the time of the institution of the suit. The main controversy was obviously not about that. It was merely a small item. In the matter, the main controversy was the propriety of the V.-C.'s order entitling the trustees to retain the costs out of the subsequent income of the married woman, as to which she was restrained from anticipation. In Hyde v. Hyde (supra) the O.A., in dealing with a sequestration, allowed the sequestrator to attach and take in execution the arrears of a married woman's separate estate which were due at the time the sequestration issued, and they made no reference there to any earlier time. But apart from that it appears to me that what we have to deal with is, not Glanville, In re, but the Married Women's Property Act. I confess, I am not at all disposed to extend the decision in Glanville, In re, to a case which arises under that Act, for several reasons. In the first place, the Court itself, in Glanville, In re, declined to say what would be right in a case arising under the Act. Fry, L.J., is pointed upon that. He says "The action was begun in 1882, before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. How the case would have stood if the plaintiff had been suing without a next friend, under the provisions of that Act, I give no opinion; the question is one of some difficulty, and is not now before us." That is precisely the question which we have to deal with. The Married Women's Property Act, s. 1, enables a married woman to sue without a next friend; and, what is far more important to my mind is this, that the Act departs from the principle upon which Pike v Fitzgibbon was decided, and which was taken as the foundation of the decision in Glanville, In re. The Act, as I understand it, alters the whole law as laid down in Pike v Fitzgibbon—p. 632.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—Reliance was placed upon the doctrine of Lindley, L.J., in Holtby v Hodgson to the effect that upon the death of the husband such an execution could issue. He says "Suppose her husband were to die the restraint would is gone, the judgment would bind her, and execution could be issued upon it." If that is right, I agree that Mr Mackenzie's contention would be sound. But I think it is not right. It seems to me that Beckett v Tasker (post, col 1268) and Pelton v Harrison (No 1), (post, col 1268) are both authorities to show that the death of the husband does not convert a judgment in the form of Scott v Morley (post, col 1287) into a judgment upon which the widow can be possibly called upon to pay —p. 332 KENNEDY, J. concurred

V. WILLIAMS, L.J. (after discussing Scott v Morley (post, col 1287), Pelton v Harrison, (No 1) (post), Beckett v Tasker (post), Pellier v. Gurney (supra, col 1265), and Pelley v Griffith (supra, col 1267), continued). The only authority which at all conflicts with this continuous line of decisions is Holtby v. Hodgson, or, rather, the dictum of Lindley, L.J., in his judgment in that case, to the effect that separate property that she (the wife) is restrained from anticipating, which cannot be got at in any way while her husband is living, becomes immediately subject to the judgment as soon as he is dead. The judgment itself in Holtby v. Hodgson involved no such proposition. The husband in that case was alive, and the only question in the case was whether a judgment obtained against a married woman in her husband's lifetime, substantially in the Scott v Morley form, in an action on a contract made by her during coverture, could be enforced by a garnishee order under Ord. XLV. 1.1, attaching a judgment debt due on a judgment recovered by her in an action for malicious prosecution brought by her during coverture. The Court held that the judgment created an attachable debt. There is nothing in this judgment, or in the finding that a married woman is under such a contract a personal debtor, inconsistent with the limitation of the contracting power of a married woman, or with the limitation of the satisfaction of damages recovered against her to separate property coming to her possession during coverture, which seem to me to be the limitations established by the cases to which I have called attention. Holtby v. Hodgson was followed in Pelton v Harrison (No 2) (supra, col 1268). In which it was held that a judgment against a married woman as a personal one, although enforceable against her separate estate only, and that costs due to a married woman in respect of an interlocutory application might be satisfied by an order for set-off under Ord. LXV. r. 27, sub-r. 21, of costs due from the married woman under a judgment in the Scott v Morley form. Pelton v Harrison (No. 1) was cited, but neither Lopes, L.J., nor Kay, L.J., seem to have considered that case inconsistent with Holtby v. Hodgson. It is further to be observed that both in Pelton v Harrison (No. 1) and in Beckett v Tasker the judgment in the Scott v Morley form was obtained in actions brought after the death of the husband.—p. 941. A. L. SMITH, L.J. concurred

COZZENS-BABY, J. (after referring to a number of cases, continued). It seems to me to follow, from the authorities I have cited, that separate estate may be said to exist notwithstanding discovery. It is "suspended" in this sense—that the widow's power of disposition over it is the same as if it had been given to her simply and without words creating a separate use. It is not extinct, because it becomes operative upon a second marriage. If the coverture ends by her death it is still regarded as her separate estate, and is applied in satisfaction of her debts and liabilities. If the coverture ends by her husband's death the same principle ought to apply. Unless, therefore, I am constrained by authority, I should hold that the combined effect of the two sections (sect. 1, sub sect. 5 and sect. 10) of the Act of 1882 to which I have referred was to vest in the trustee the whole of the life interest of Mrs. Ryan, subject only and except so far as it was protected by the restraint upon anticipation, and that directly the restraint upon anticipation ceased by Mr. Ryan's death, the title became free from impediment. But it has been strongly argued that I am not at liberty to take this view, in consequence of the decision of the C.A. in Pelton Bros v Harrison (No. 1). In that case judgment had been obtained against a married woman in the form settled in Scott v Morley (post, col 1287). This judgment was obtained after her husband's death, but in respect of a contract entered into during coverture, and the question was whether a recoverer had been properly appointed of the property of the married woman as to which during the coverture she had been restrained from anticipating. The C.A. held that the judgment creditor could not attach this property, and Kay, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "The question is whether under this judgment the property which the married woman was restrained from anticipating can be affected. The shortest answer is that the judgment expressly directs that there shall be no execution against such property, and in my opinion it is as completely excepted from the consequences of the judgment as if it had been specifically mentioned in it, and stated to be excepted because the married woman was restrained from anticipating it." This, of course, was a sufficient ground for the decision. But the Lord Justice proceeds to discuss the Act of 1882, s. 1, sub-ss 2 and 4, and uses language upon which great reliance is placed. "But it is argued that when the husband died this property was still separate property, and that by the death of the husband the restraint on anticipation was gone, and it may therefore be treated as separate property acquired upon the death of the husband. The answer to this argument is, that there is no such thing as separate property of an unmarried woman. Separate property means property held separately from the husband." This case turned upon sect 1, sub-sect 2, which may be called the contract section, and not upon sub-sect 5, which is the bankruptcy section. But I have felt great difficulty in consequence of these weighty observations of Kay, L.J. They were not, however, necessary to the decision of the case, and they seem to me not to be consistent with the views expressed by the C.A. itself in Pike v. Fitzgibbon (supra, col. 1262), and by other judges in many cases, to some of which I have referred.—p. 667.

KAY, J.—In Knight v Knight the debt which it was sought to set off was a debt due from the husband as executor. He himself was the executor, and received assets of the testator who had given the legacy to his wife. He being indebted as executor, the wife sought to have her legacy nevertheless settled upon her, and it was held that no equity to a settlement arose. These other cases were not cited there, but I cannot for a moment imagine that they were not present to the mind of such an accomplished judge as Hall, V.-C., and, therefore, I presume he thought that some difference must have arisen from the fact that the debt in that case was not a debt due to the testator in his lifetime, but was a debt due from the husband as executor of the testator. At present I do not appreciate the difference myself, but I cannot treat it at all as an authority which would in any way overrule Carr v Taylor and Batchelor, in re, both of which cases were decided before it—p. 481.

R. 544.—C.A., SELBORNE, L.C.—The ultimate limitation to the husband is in accordance with the form of settlement which Lord Chelmsford adopted in Spirett v Willows, and which James, V.-C. adopted in Croxtan v May (supra). . . . The fund here is not a reversionary interest, and the husband has a right to reduce it into possession, which is intercepted by the wife's equity to a settlement. The only question is, therefore, whether that equity is to go beyond making a provision for the wife and her children. In my opinion that point was virtually decided by Lord Cranworth in Carter v Taggart, though down to that time a pretence had crept in of giving the wife a power of appointment. In Suggitt's Trusts, in re, Lord Cairns held it inconsistent to interfere with the right of the husband any more than was necessary, and that to give a power of appointment to the wife did go beyond what was necessary. It appears to me, upon the same principle, that the Court would go beyond the necessity of the equity to a settlement if it in fact placed the fund in the position of a reversionary interest. . . . The same form must be used as was used in Spirett v Willows.—p. 488 MELLISH, L.J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—The question is whether in the discretion of the Court, having regard to all the circumstances, the whole fund ought not to be settled. It is true that, technically speaking, it does not fall within the precise terms used by Lord Cairns in Suggitt's Trusts, In re, but it seems to me that, reading his judgment fairly, he was dealing there only with specific instances of conduct on the part of the husband which would lead the Court to settle the whole fund, and it seems to me that those cases might be truly summed up in the term "aggravated misconduct on the part of the husband"—p. 77.

GALLOWAY, J.—It is true that the property is not very large, but in Suggitt's Trusts, In re, it was held that a smaller sum ought to be apportioned. No doubt in this case the husband is an undischarged bankrupt, and that might be a ground for settling the whole amount upon the wife. Looking, however, at the fact that the husband is earning 18s a week, and that that sum is not likely to be disturbed by his creditors, and looking also at the fact that in Suggitt's Trusts, In re, the husband was only earning 11s a week, I think I shall be properly exercising that discretion which, according to all the authorities, I possess, by directing two-thirds to be settled on the wife—p. 155.

PARKER, B.—The only doubt in this case arises from the observation of Lord Ellenborough in McNeillage v. Holloway, that a promissory note may be treated as a personal claim in possession. Now in that respect, I think there was a mistake, and an incorrect expression used; but it was unnecessary for his lordship to lay down such a doctrine, in order to decide the case then before him. In fact, the decision in Richards v. Richards has qualified that position. In that case the Court of K. B. said that a promissory note was, in the ordinary course of things, a chose in action, and that there was nothing to take it out of the common rule, that choses in action given to the wife survive to her after the death of her husband, unless he has reduced them into possession—p. 427. ABINGER, C.B., ALDERSON and ROLFES, B.B. concurred.

PATTERSON, J. (for the Court).—The decision in McNeillage v. Holloway is wholly inapplicable to this case here. The observations of Lord Ellenborough, in giving judgment, are undoubtedly too strong, and have been corrected and modified by this Court in Richards v. Richards (supra), and by the Court of Ex. in Gaters v. Madeley (supra). But even if they were in strict accordance with the law, they would not avail the defendant in this case, for they suppose a reduction into possession by the husband during his wife's life, of which he merely receives interest in the way stated in this case: is not even any evidence—p. 150.

Rogers v. Bolton (1880) 8 L. R. 11, 69 FALLES, C.B.—There a fraus solis was the basis of a note, made, and died during the husband's lifetime. An action was brought on the note by her administrator, who in that case happened not to be her husband. The question was, whether the note was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and the only mode by which the operation of the statute could be avoided was, by proof of payment of interest within six years. The note had never been reduced into possession—that was an admitted fact. The payment of interest had been to the husband.

Two questions arose in that case, which were very much mixed up with each other—one, whether the husband was a competent witness, the other, whether the payment of interest would take the case out of the statute. PATSON, J., in giving judgment, after showing that the note had not been reduced into possession by payment of interest during the coverture, continues—"It was further argued that the husband's evidence did not avail for the purpose for which it was given—the taking of the note out of the Statute of Limitations, but it is clear that it did. If he received the interest, not in his own right, but as agent for his wife—which he clearly did—then the interest, of course, was paid to her." "I do not know that the expression, 'paid to the husband as agent for his wife,' is perfectly accurate, but there is no doubt that it was paid to him in right of his wife, and I think the decision is no more than that, as the payment was one in right of the wife, her administrator was entitled to rely upon it, to take the case out

FRY, J.—This case has found its way into Rolfe's Abridgment, Bacon's Abridgment, and other text books, and, so far as I know, it has never been impugned. In it, as in the present case, the husband and wife had appointed an agent to receive the money of the wife, he received it and did not pay it over, and it was held that his receipt operated as a conversion of the money. Does the fact that in the present case the wife was an administratrix and was entitled only to a distributive share of the fund make any difference? It appears that the debts of the intestate had been already paid, and therefore the shares of the next-of-kin under the Statute of Distributions were immediately receivable. The shares were present interests. But, further than that, I think the decision of the H. L. in Cooper v. Cooper [(1874) 44 L J. Ch. 6, L. R. 7 H L 53. See "ELECTION," col 979] shows that the fact that the wife was only an administratrix can make no difference—p. 446.

Leach had refused to direct any payment to be made to the representative of the deceased wife, except in the presence of the representative of the deceased husband. Lord Cottenham, on having that case called to his attention, in Loy v. Duckett, intimated his opinion that the view of Sir J. Whether that dictum be or be not accurately reported, I will not undertake to say; but in the judgment in which it occurs, Lord Holt differed from the rest of the Court, and the decision was contrary to his opinion. From the decision there was an appeal, which was afterwards abandoned. Lord Kenyon [*Milbourn v. WILLIAMS)—The case of the plaintiff is at least as strong as that of the widow in Gage v. Acton, upon which the Court below relied. That case was much controverted in Milbourn v. Stewart, and was there alleged by counsel to have proceeded on a confusion of legal and equitable principles, and even to have gone beyond that relief which a Court of Equity would have accorded to the obligee. But Lord Kenyon and the other judges upheld Gage v. Acton in the strongest terms, and Buller, J., referred to a case of Ford v. Ford [Hayes & Ford v. Ford, Tr 9 Geo 3, B. R. 5 Term Rep 388, n.], where Lord Mansfield had, notwithstanding the marriage of the obligee with the obligor, held a bond to be subsisting at law after the coverture had determined. Hore v. Beecher, relied upon by the appellant, can scarcely be reconciled with the doctrines of a Court of equity, as to the inalienable character of a wife's reversionary interest—p. 87.

GRANT, M.R.—I have found two cases in the time of Lord Nottingham, to which it is proper to advert, though from the reports, in which they are found, and the position they affirm, they are not entitled to any great attention. Those cases are Brudenell v. Price and Paget v. Paget. In each of them Lord Nottingham is represented to have directed part of the property, settled, or agreed to be settled, upon the wife and children, to be laid out in the purchase of an office for the husband upon the consent of the wife. The proposition that the interest of the children could be affected by her consent, could not be decided or contended. Of Paget v. Paget no mention is made in Lord Nottingham's MS. notes, in the possession of Mr. Hargrave, Brudenell v. Price is mentioned, but in a way quite different from that represented by the report. According to the MS., she merely consented that part of her unsettled property should be paid to her husband.—p. 582.

WOOD, V.C.—The point had never been actually decided as between the other creditors and the wife's estate; but in Tate v. Austin, Lord Cowper said that the wife had the right of a surety, except as against onerous creditors of the husband, and that against them she had not such right. In Clinton v. Hooper, Lord Thurlow noticed that dictum and said, that he regarded the doctrine as then settled. The decision in Tate v. Austin was affirmed by the H. L., but this doctrine having been only stated there as a dictum, the appeal did not make the dictum stronger.—p. 894.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for self, RIGBY and WILLIAMS, L.J.).—The authorities bearing on the subject, beginning with Huntingdon (Earl) v. Huntingdon (Countess), and coming down to Hudson v. Carmichael, show that if a married woman charges her property with money for the purpose of paying her husband's debts, and the money raised by her is so applied, she is primæ facie regarded in equity, and as between herself and him, as lending him and not giving him the money raised on her property, and as entitled to have her property exonerated by him for the charge she has created. This doctrine is purely equitable, and the authorities which establish it show that it is based on an inference to be drawn from the circumstances of each particular case; the primæ facie inference being in such a case as that supposed that both parties intended that the wife's assistance should be limited to the necessity of the case, and should not go beyond such necessity. But even where the wife charges her property with money to pay her husband's debts incurred without reference to her, there may be circumstances which prevent any inference from arising in her favour. Thus, if a settlement is made by the husband on his wife at the time she charges her estate, he is regarded as purchasing her assistance, and the inference that the parties intended that the wife's property should be exonerated by the husband does not arise.—Lewis v. Nangle, Clinton v. Hooper is the leading authority to show that the doctrine in question is based on an inference to be drawn in each case from all the facts of that particular case. It was long ago settled that although under the old law a husband became liable for the antenuptial debts of the wife, she had no right in equity to compel him to exonerate property of hers charged with those debts, even although he had expressly covenanted to pay them.—See Lewis v. Nangle and Kinnell (Earl) v. Money.—p. 270.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—One adverse case was cited, which I must notice, May v. Skay (supra), the marginal note being, "A having gone abroad, and left his wife unprovided for, the plaintiff lent her money to purchase necessaries, and she applied it accordingly"—held, that the plaintiff could not sue A. for the money in a Court of equity." But it appears that the V.C. who decided that case, not holding that there was not a debt due from A. to the plaintiff which might be recovered, proceeded upon the notion that this was a legal debt, the payment of which could not be directed by a Court of equity. His honour more fully explains that as his ratio decidendi in the subsequent case of Holt v. Brice (supra). But this is clearly erroneous, that no action at law could be maintained for such a demand, was considered too clear for argument in the recent case of Knox v. Bushell ((1857) 3 C. B. PARK, J.—I am surprised at the language ascribed to the Court in Horwood v. Heffer, because it is alienant from every feeling of a man and a Christian. It is not to be endured that the mistress of a house should confine herself to a chamber with her necessities, when a prostitute is sitting at the same table with her husband. CHITTY, J.—The meaning of sect. 12 of the [Dower] Act was considered by Malins, V.-C. in Roper v Roper. He held that the widow had no priority over other legacies in respect of an annuity bequeathed to her by her husband in satisfaction of dower where the only real estate of the testator had been conveyed to him with a declaration against dower (see sect. 6). The decision appears to me to be right; but in the report of his judgment there is attributed to the V.-C. a dictum that if the dower had been barred by the will she would have been entitled to priority. With this dictum I find myself unable to agree. The statute makes no difference between the effect of a bar by deed and a bar by will—p. 569

JESSIE, M. R.—I certainly must respectfully dissent from some of the observations in Rowland v Cuthbertson. . . All that his lordship said was this, "that dealing with the 4th section [Dower Act] I am not sure that it is conclusive on this case, because, in order to dispose of the land the testator must point it out specifically or designate it in some way." But surely that is a mistake, with the greatest possible deference, a testator disposes of his lands by the gift of "all my real estate." His lordship says you cannot dispose of land except by designating it, but will anybody doubt that a gift of "all my real estate" disposes of his lands? I confess I am utterly unable to accede to that view. I think it desirable to express my opinion plainly because this case may be cited hereafter, and may lead to similar difficulties to those which have occurred here. I think the 9th section applies to this case. It is this, "Where a husband shall devise any land." The odd part of the matter is this, that [Rowland v Cuthbertson] his lordship held that the 9th section applied, although the words are "any land," the same words as in the 4th section, and the gift there was of "all his real estate," but if he was right as to any doubt about the 4th section, it appears to me that his doubt would have extended to the 9th section. These words are the same. If it required a specific description, I do not understand how he came to the conclusion that the 9th section applied. It appears to me that if he attention had been drawn to that he would have seen, his own decision shows it, that "any land," being the words in the 4th section, there was no reason to have it more specifically described than it is in the 9th section—p 217

COTTON, L.J.—It is perfectly clear that Sir T Sewall, in Jackson v Parker was simply saying that, notwithstanding the proviso for redemption professed to give the wife a right larger than her right to dower, it did not alter the rights of the parties. If the wife redeemed, she would only get a right in the estate such as she had before, viz. a right to dower, and the Court of equity would not take the estate (though it was her husband's originally) from her, except on the terms of allowing her her dower out of it. With reference to the case before Lord Redesdale (Jackson v Innes), I think he was merely dealing with the particular form of the proviso for redemption in that case, and he says that if, when a wife joins for the purpose of releasing her dower in a mortgage of her husband's estate, the limitation of the equity of redemption gives it in form to some one who was not owner at the time of executing the mortgage, that will not change the property. At the time of executing the mortgage in the case supposed the husband was the owner, and I think Lord Redesdale must mean this, that if the limitation is, as in Jackson v Parker, to the wife, it will not alter the property, she may redeem, but she may redeem only for the purpose of securing to herself that which, but for the form of the limitation, she could not have got—viz. her dower. That explains what is said by Lord Redesdale in that case. It was in reference to the particular form of limitation in Jackson v Parker, and he explains it by saying that the form of the reservation of the equity of redemption does not change the right. The right of the wife, to whom the equity of redemption is reserved by the deed, was a right to dower only, and she was entitled to redeem under that limitation and not independently of it. The only other case to which I need refer is Dolin v Coltman. That is very shortly reported, and I think probably it is the same in principle. It may have been that in the mortgage deed there, the equity of redemption was reserved to the wife, and the Court may have considered that setting that up as an alteration in the property of the estate so as to defeat the subsequent mortgagees was a fraud, and what the Court gave the wife in that case was a right to insist on the reservation to her of the equity of redemption, not for the purpose of making the estate her own, but only for the purpose of securing her right to dower, which otherwise she would have lost—pp 229—230

GROVE, J.—I think that that case clearly distinguishes on the ground suggested by the defendant's counsel. There the husband, at the time of his death, had no legal estate at all but only an equitable fee. Here the husband died seised of the legal fee to which the right of dower would attach.—p 33.

LAWSON, J.—There is no authority in the books that a gift of a chattel to a wife by a stranger without any expressed intention, will ensure to her separate use, except a dictum of Lord Hardwicke in Graham v. Londonderry.
The question there was as to diamonds set in a picture by the Regent of France, which Lord Londonderry delivered to her, saying it was a present sent her by the Regent of France. In that case the gift was of a very peculiar character, a picture set with diamonds. The position of the lady, the circumstances of the case—the fact that it passed through the hands of the husband —may have furnished evidence that she was to hold them for her separate use, as a gift of chattels by the husband during coverture have been held to be intended for her separate use.
Thus is the naked case of a stranger giving a married lady, at the time living with her husband a gift of certain articles not expressed to be for her separate use.—p. 492 MORRIS, o j concurred.

B. 181, see "BANKRUPTCY" col. 137] it was held that such a gift [of jewels] was a settlement within sect. 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, on the ground that the donor contemplated the retention by his wife of the presents that he gave her. But the inference which I draw from that case is the reverse of that suggested to me. It may well be that a voluntary settlement, voidable by creditors, was created, because the jewels were given, not as some small sums might be given, for immediate expenditure, but to constitute a permanent possession of the wife. But the jewels became the property of the wife, and no doubt she could have given a good title had she sold them. And therefore the inference drawn by the learned judge from the facts, which, as to the occasions of the gifts, were very like those in the present case, was not that the wife took the jewels as paraphernalia, but rather as settled to her separate use. Indeed, it does not seem to have occurred to anyone to think of paraphernalia in connection with the case, though such a view would have been conclusive in favour of the creditors.—p. 40

STIRLING, J.—What was decided in Scott v. Morley was, that there was no power under sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, to commit to prison a married woman for her default in paying a sum for which judgment had been recovered against her in a Court of law, and which, under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was payable out of her separate estate, and not otherwise. The proper form of judgment in such a case was settled by the C. A. in Scott v. Morley. That decision, which relates to the application of sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, does not govern the present case; but it is necessary to consider the reasons on which it was based, and to ascertain how they apply. Put shortly, the ratio decidendi appears to be this: sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, conferred on a married woman the capacity of entering into, and rendering herself liable on, any contract as a separate sole, but her liability was strictly limited to her separate estate. And in the event of her becoming, or being sued, on which respect she was also put in the position of a separate sole, then, whether the notion was in contract or in tort, the damages and costs recovered against her in any action or proceeding were to be payable out of her separate estate, and not otherwise. This enactment, in the words of Bowen, L. J., created only a proprietary and not a personal liability. On the other hand, sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, only authorises a commitment where there is a debt due from the defendant; and a debt payable out of the separate estate of a married woman is not a debt due from her. The order in the present case is not an order for payment of a sum of money to a particular person, but for payment of a sum into Court. The distinction between the two was pointed out and explained in Greer, In re; Napier v. Rankine (1895) 64 L. J. Ch. 620; [1895] 2 Ch. 217, 15 R. 598, 72 L. T. 865, 43 W. R. 547, 2 Macdonald 350; 59 J. P. 441—CHITTY, J.)... Previously to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the husband was liable, and orders would be naturally sought for and made against him and not against the wife. See W. v. Higgs and Ottway v. Wing appeal to show that attachment might, in a proper case, issue against a married woman.—p. 188

BRETT, M.R. stated the old and well-known rule with regard to the construction of enactments affecting rights, viz., that, unless the language used is clear to the contrary, it must be construed prospectively only, and not retrospectively so as to affect rights acquired before the Act passed. Sub-sec. 4 of sect. 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, clearly affected rights, and gave to the party with whom a contract was made by a married woman a greater right than he would have had before the Act. [His lordship continued.] The rule, therefore, applies that, unless the words are clear, the enactment is not to be construed retrospectively. It was argued that the decision of this Court in Weldon v. Winslow is contrary to the view we are now taking, it being there held that the 2nd sub-section of the 1st section was to be construed retrospectively. But the ground of the decision in that case was that no right was affected or altered by the construction there applied to the 2nd sub-section. It was there pointed out that, the action being in tort for personal injuries, and the wife being the meritorious cause of action, the plaintiff could have sued before the Act passed precisely as she did after the Act, subject only to the liability to a plea in abatement, upon which she would have been forced to join the husband for conformity only. It was held, therefore, that there was no question of alteration of a right, but only one of procedure, the effect of sub-sec. 2 being only to prevent the defendant from objecting that the husband was not joined for conformity. When an Act deals with procedure it affects all subsequent procedure, but it cannot rightly be said therefore to be retrospective, because it is only the subsequent procedure that it affects; it cannot be said to affect any right which existed before the Act. The case of Weldon v. Winslow is, therefore, altogether distinguishable from the present, and is not authority with regard to the construction of a section that affects rights. For these reasons, it appears to me that the judgment of Chitty, J., in Conolan v. Leyland was correct, and that, if the judgment in Bursill v. Tanner was to the contrary, it cannot be supported. The order must be therefore modified so as to be in conformity with the law as it existed previously to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.—p. 236

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I agree. The substantial question we have to decide is whether the 4th sub-section of the 1st section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is retrospective. There appear to have been conflicting decisions on this question in Conolan v. Leyland and Bursill v. Tanner. In Bursill v. Tanner, the Div. Court seems to have proceeded on the assumption that the sub-section was retrospective. But in Conolan v. Leyland, Chitty, J., took a different view, and held that the 4th sub-section was not retrospective. For the reasons given by the M.B., I agree that that construction was correct. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present case to go into the matter, but I desire to reserve for a future occasion the consideration of the question how far the judgment in Bursill v. Tanner is correct with regard to the form of order in cases to which the sub-section applies, as to which I entertain considerable doubt. A modified form of order seems to have since come into use, which was used in the present case, and with regard to the question whether that is entirely free from objection I also reserve my opinion.—p. 237

BOWEN, L.J.—It is only a decision that, on an application by a judgment creditor under sect. 5 of the Debtors Act for an order for payment by instalments by the defendant, proof of the defendant's means need not be given. And in that case the defendant had not pleaded coverture. I take it that the judgment was in the ordinary form of judgment against a defendant who was not a married woman.—p. 975. RIDLEY, J.—Hood-Barrs v Heriot merely decided that an appeal by a married woman was not a "proceeding instituted" by her [within sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1895]. The case most in favour of the claimant is Moran v Place where it was decided that a married woman who had entered a covert in respect of a will had not "instituted the proceedings" in the probate action. But in such a case the entry of the covert merely claims that if anything is done to set up the will, the lady shall have notice of it. (The proceedings are instituted afterwards.) The covert only says in effect "Let me know what is done." The person entering it can only be a defendant, and it is difficult to contend that a defendant has instituted proceedings. In this case it is very difficult for the lady to claim the goods as heir, and gave notice to the high bailiff that they were hers —p. 855.

STIRLING, J. (after discussing Holmes v. Blogg, Taylor, Ex parte and Corpe v. Overton) continued. It is to be observed that all the learned judges [in Corpe v. Overton] who deal with the case, distinguish it from Holmes v. Blogg, on the ground that there had been actual enjoyment of the demised premises in Holmes v. Blogg. They did not say that the mere demise itself in default of occupation would have been sufficient, and it seems to me that the true rule to be drawn from the cases is to consider whether the infant has derived any advantage under the contract. In the present case there was no advantage to the infant. She took no part in the management of the company, and did not attend any meetings. The only advantage she has had is the allotment of shares, and the fact of having her name placed on the register. It seems to me that that is not an advantage within the rule of Corpe v. Overton —p. 796.

LOPES, J.—In this particular case evidence as to the amount of clothes the defendant possessed at the time when the order relied on was given was admissible, and the jury should have been told that in arriving at a conclusion whether the goods supplied by the plaintiffs were necessary or not, they should consider whether the defendant was already sufficiently supplied. Against this view the authority of Ryder v. Wombwell has been cited, and it has been suggested that this Court is bound by the decision in that case, being that of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and also the last decision on the point. I agree, however, entirely with my brother Field, that, looking at the conflict of authority, and the fact that the judges who reviewed that case in the Exchequer Chamber carefully, as it seems to me, kept open the point now raised, it is open to us to use our own judgment. Under these circumstances I think that we ought to act upon the decision in Fisher v. Rodgers (supra, col. 1294), and the long chain of authorities on which it was founded.—p. 414

JAMES, L.J.—According to my own view an infant may be an agent. An infant may be the donee of a power of attorney. Hearle v. Green- bank, which is the only decision on the subject, no doubt decided that an infant could not exercise a power over real estate; but the judgment was expressly and carefully limited to real estate, and is—if not an implication that it was otherwise as to personal estate and probably otherwise as to gavelkind estates in Kent—at least no authority to the contrary.—p. 246.

LINDLEY, J.—Coxhead v. Mullis. must be taken as binding on us—p. 689

DENNISMAN, J.—It was decided by this Court in Coxhead v. Mullis that sect. 3 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1871 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62) applies to actions for breach of promise of marriage. By that decision I am bound. That case further decided that, where there has been an express promise of marriage during the infancy of a defendant, and the only evidence subsequently is evidence of mere conduct on the part of the engaged couple, consisting of their treating one another as an engaged couple and keeping company as such, without any evidence of words capable of being construed as a fresh promise, such conduct must be referred to the promise made during the infancy of the defendant, and held to be mere evidence of ratification within the meaning of the above clause. But it has also been held in Northcote v. Doughty, by which I am also bound, that where there is evidence not only that after the defendant's coming of age the defendant and the plaintiff behaved as before, but that the defendant used language capable of being considered as a fresh promise, it is for the jury to find whether the words so used amount merely to evidence of a ratification of the promise made during infancy, or whether they prove a fresh promise—p. 691.

CONNINGHAM, C. J. (dissenting).—In Coxhead v. Mullis, my brother Lopes and I held that . . . the Infants' Relief Act applied to the contract of marriage. That case has never been overruled; but in the later case of Northcote v. Doughty, and again in his judgment in the present case, my brother DENNISMAN does not conceal his opinion that it was not well decided. It is true that my brother LINDLEY accepts the case, and in a sense does my brother DENNISMAN but if it is the law, the sooner it is overruled the better, and, as the only judgment actually pronounced in it is mine, I ought, if on consideration I think it wrong, to say so, and to give over my facility for having it reviewed in the C. A. If it is not law, there is a short and summary end to the case before us, because I do not question that, but for 37 & 38 Vict. c. 62, the verdict in this case ought to be entered for the plaintiff—p. 692.

ESKIN, M.R.—In a case like this I am of opinion that the right question for the jury, if there is evidence in support of it, is the question stated by Lopes, L.J. in Northcote v. Doughty (supra)—viz., did the defendant intend to make a new absolute promise or merely to re-affirm the old promise? I wish to add that the only question of law decided in Ditcham v. Worrall was that there was evidence to go to the jury—ib. LINDLEY and LOPES, L.J.J. concurred.

KEKEWICH, J.—Chubb v. Griffiths is not very satisfactory, as the record has been looked at by the registrar, and notwithstanding that the decree bears on the face of it the name of a most careful registrar, it does not appear from the documents that the defendant was an infant, still less that a guardian ad litem was defending. Mr. Archibald Smith appeared as counsel "for the infant," according to the report, and urged that it was "not a case for costs as against an infant." The judgment also is a little puzzling, because the M.R. says: "In such a case, I am of opinion, upon the principle laid down in Cory v. Gertecken (supra), that infancy cannot protect him from paying the costs of this suit." . . . I do not find that the case helps me much. It does not give the principle on which the defendant had to pay the costs, so that if I only had Chubb v. Griffiths to go upon, I might hesitate to order the payment in the present case. . . . No doubt the question argued there [Lemprière v. Lange] was a question of fraud. It was an action against an infant who had obtained the lease of a furnished house by representing that he was of full age. . . . The main point decided was this. It was held that the lease must be declared void and possession given up, and the defendant restrained by injunction from parting with the furniture, but that he was not liable for use and occupation. . . . Cory v. Gertecken, which was cited in Chubb v. Griffiths, was also cited in Lemprière v. Lange. When the M.R. eventually gave judgment on the main point, he said that the injunction must go, and "the defendant must pay the costs of the action." . . . In Jones, Ex parte, Jones, In re (supra), Chubb v. Griffiths was referred to by Sir G. Jessel, and he remarks that it was a case of tort. He does not take that opportunity of saying that the defendant did not appear, or ought not to have been held liable to pay costs. That, however, does not go very far; but it shows that the case was at least brought under his attention, so that he had the opportunity of correcting it if he considered that it was wrong. Lemprière v. Lange is mentioned in Seton on Judgments (5th ed.), pp. 837 and 1028, but it does not give the form of the order as to payment of costs. 1 am also told that Knob's v Griffiths has been referred to in several of the text books on practice.

KAY, J.—Now, De Pereda v De Mancha—the reasoning of which, I confess, I have some difficulty in following—certainly makes it very difficult for me to say that, if the infant were a British subject, she would not be a ward of Court. The only distinction between that case and the present is that in the former the fund was standing to an account the title of which included the name of the infant, and therefore it was practically standing in the infant's name. Here it is standing to an account which includes the class of which the infant is one, but does not mention her name. However, looking at the decision in De Pereda v De Mancha, I am afraid that I could not, if this were the case of a British subject, say that there is any essential difference between the two cases, because the reasoning of that decision, as I understand it, is this. If there be a fund in Court under its administration standing to the account of an infant, or to an account under which an infant is entitled, then, inasmuch as the Court is bound to administer that fund, the infant will be treated as a ward of Court to the same extent as an infant who is a party to an action for the administration of property belonging to that infant. Undoubtedly we use the words "ward of Court" in such a case in rather a special sense. Without at all intimating any opinion that De Pereda v De Mancha has been wrongly decided (which, of course, I should not venture to say), it seems to me very doubtful whether, even if rightly decided, it could be intended to include a case like this. In this case the money paid into Court was a mere legacy, the infant was not a party, and would not have been properly a party to the action under which the money was paid in, even under the old practice. The money was only paid in because it was subject to a trust for one for life with remainder over, and it was not at the moment distributable. I should hesitate very long before I held that that made an infant, who was entitled in reversion to a share of that money, a ward of Court.—pp 270, 371.

LORD HERSHELL.—That case [Buckingham-shire (Earl) v. Drury] has given rise to a great deal of criticism since the time when the decision in it was pronounced, and much disapproval has been expressed of it. I do not think it necessary to say much with regard to it, for this reason.
 That case decides this, and this alone, that it was competent for an infant, by means of a marriage settlement, to bar his right to obtain by virtue of the marriage an interest in her husband's property, and in the opinion expressed by Lord Mansfield he distinctly says, "I approve the distinction taken by Wilmot, J. between infants contracting for conveying away something of their own and barring themselves of a right which is a third person's." It is quite unnecessary to inquire whether that distinction is one which can be supported by reasoning or not. It is sufficient to say that, whatever be the validity of the decision in that case, it cannot be relied upon as an authority beyond this, that in certain cases an infant may deprive herself of rights which she would otherwise have possessed in the property of her husband. . . In Sampson and Wall, In re, the majority of the G. A. came to the conclusion that those words ["It shall be lawful for every infant upon or in contemplation of his or her marriage"] ought to be construed so as to include a post-nuptial as well as an ante-nuptial settlement, if the post-nuptial settlement was made on the occasion of the marriage, so as to be connected with that event. I do not propose to express any opinion with regard to that decision one way or another. It is unnecessary, in the view which I take, to do so. But certainly those who pronounced the decision do not appear to have contemplated as a logical consequence of it that which the learned counsel for the appellants have contended does logically follow—namely, that the statute not only applies to post-nuptial as well as to ante-nuptial settlements, but, because it applies to them, indicates an intention that an infant, though married, should have the full powers which the statute confers.

 PEABSON, J.—Mr. Cookson has argued that an advancement by a father to a son to enable him to pay his debts is under no circumstances an advancement by potior within the statute, and he relied upon what was said by Jessel, M.R. in Taylor v Taylor. With all deference to the M.R. I cannot agree in his views. I think that a sum of money given by a father to his son to pay his debts is, in itself, an advancement, as much as a sum of money given him for any other purpose. In Jugd v Boyd, Wood, V.C. said, "Wherever a sum is paid for a particular purpose, which is thought good and right by the father, and which the son himself desires, if it be money which is drawn out in considerable amount, and not a small sum, it must be treated as an advance. The payment of the money is the important thing—the Court does not look to the application. As to the debt, suppose the young man had represented to his father that it was extremely important they should be paid, in order that he might keep his position in the army, and the father had paid these sums in order to assist him, it would have been clearly an advance." I cannot conceive stronger language than that. In my opinion, if a sum of money is paid by a father for the benefit of his son, it is an "advancement by potior"—p. 723

 JESSEL, M.R.—In Sayre v Hughes the V.C. says this: "It has been argued that a mother is not a person bound to make an advancement to her child, and that a widowed mother is not a person standing in such a relation to her child as to raise a presumption that in a transaction of this kind a benefit was intended for the child. But the case of a stranger who stands in loco parentis seems not so strong as that of a mother." That is not the question. There is no rule upon the point of strength, but the question is one of equitable obligation. Then the V.C. proceeds: "In De Visme, In re, it was said that a mother does not stand in such a relationship to a child as to raise a presumption of benefit for the child. The question in that case arose on a petition in lunacy, and it seems to have been taken for granted that no presumption of benefit arises in the case of a mother. But maternal affection, as a motive of bounty, is, perhaps, the strongest of all, although the duty is not so strong as in the case of a father, inasmuch as it is the duty of a father to advance his child. That, however, is a moral obligation, not a legal one." That is not quite right. It is a moral obligation known to Courts of equity. All the G. A. decided was that there was no such moral obligation in the case of a mother as the Court could take notice of as such. That being so, the argument of the V.C. falls to the ground. The only question in such cases is whether the presumption is a presumption of law. I may say I should have an hesitation in deciding Sayre v Hughes in the same way as the V.C. did, having regard to the evidence; though I should not have arrived at the same conclusion irrespective of the evidence—p. 479.

That [Kirk v Eddowes] is a distinct decision which has been followed in numerous cases since. It shows that, where a transaction between a father and son took place after the date of the will, parol evidence of the father's intention was admissible, not as the evidence of revocation or alteration of any part of the will, but as evidence of an independent transaction, whereby the legatee received a portion of his legacy by anticipation.—p 880.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Who have every wish to give effect to an arrangement which would provide maintenance for the infants, but we cannot see our way to making an order for that purpose. We hoped at first that Howarth, In re, might help us. In that case the Court charged the expenses of the past maintenance of an infant on the corpus of an estate to which he was entitled in fee simple in possession. This was done on the principle that any one who maintained the infant could obtain a judgment against him which would charge his real estate, and that the order made substantially came to the same thing. We thought at first that by a subtle application of the same principle we could find a way of ordering a charge in the present case. But we cannot make an order having a wider effect than a judgment at law against the infant would have. Now, though an action could be brought for necessities supplied to the infants, no actions would lie against them for the premiums on the policy of insurance, and those premiums form a part of the sum which it is sought to charge. This objection appears to me to be fatal—p 294.

FRY, L.J.—In addition to what Lindley, L.J., has noticed, there is another objection. The theory is that the charge could be enforced against the estate of the child who first becomes entitled in possession. But the amount of his liability in the supposed action would be very different from the 18,600*l.* which it is now sought to charge. He would be liable only for what had been expended for his own maintenance. The principle of Howarth, In re, therefore, does not cover the case. Ring v. Jarman, the orders in which have been furnished to us, does not appear to me to help the application.—p 295.

COTTON, L.J.—In that case [Howarth, In re] the estate was an estate in possession, and the whole foundation of that case fails unless there is an estate in possession. . . I must not be considered as agreeing to the views which the judges took in that case. I do not see what authority the Court had in that case, and I do not see what authority the Court would have in this case, if there were a claim on the part of the mother here, to make such an order as was there made effectually to charge the freehold estates.—p 834.

LINDLEY, L.J. to the same effect.
LOPES, L.J.—Speaking for myself, I do not think I could have arrived at the conclusion arrived at in that case. But assuming that to be good law, there is a vast distinction between that and the present case. In Zinowarth, In re, the infant was entitled to a fee simple in possession. There was only one infant, the application was in respect of past maintenance, and the Court thought that, inasmuch as an action might be brought against the infant for necessaries, the Court might charge the property for maintenance.

Here the estate is an entailed estate, here there are five infants, the oldest of whom is tenant in tail, who, if he attains twenty-one, on the death of the protector of the settlement can bar the estate and become absolutely entitled.—p 835

I cannot bring myself to think that case [Fendall v Nash] properly decided; as upon certain contingencies both the principal and the interest would have gone to individuals who, not only did not, but could not consent, not being then in existence. In the event of the death of a child under the age of twenty-one, leaving issue, the accumulated property would have gone to that issue; and how the Court could give to the infants that property, which in that event would belong to others, I cannot conceive.—p 203

KAY, J.—Sect. 43 of the Act of 1881 was intended to replace a provision in Lord Cranworth's Act (23 & 24 Viet. c. 145, s. 20), which has been repealed by sect. 71 of the Act of 1881. Lord Cranworth's Act only enabled trustees to apply for maintenance the income to which the infant "may be entitled in respect of such property," and it was decided by the C. A. in George, In re, that in the case of a contingent legacy which did not carry interest, the income of a fund paid into Court to the contingent legacy account could not be so applied, because even if he attained twenty-one the legatee would not become entitled to any of the intermediate income. The decision was in 1877, and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act was passed in 1881. In Wolstenholme and Turner's 2nd and 3rd Editions of the Conveyancing Acts (2nd ed., p. 86; 3rd ed., p. 95), it is stated in a note that this section (43) "is so worded as to avoid the question raised in 'George, In re.' In the same note the learned editors say that "if no interest is payable on the legacy till the infant attains twenty-one, there is no income to which the section can apply, and the residuary legatee takes the income of the residue without deduction till the legacy becomes vested." The short effect of the section seems capable of being stated thus: Where the income will go along with the capital if and when the capital vests, then the income is applicable under the section for the benefit of the infant, otherwise not." But if that is the effect of the Act it does not avoid the question raised in George, In re. The precise question in George, In re was whether Lord Cranworth's Act applied to income to which the infant never could become entitled, and if the Act of 1881 was passed to avoid the effect of George, In re, the intention must have been to enable the trustees to maintain the infant out of income of a contingent legacy, which income out of the Act would belong to someone else and not to the infant even though he should attain twenty-one. I have communicated with Mr. Wolstenholme, who tells me, and allows me to state, that the note in question is erroneous. The reference should have been to Cotton's Trusts, In re. In that case the income of the legacy would belong to the legatee if he attained twenty-one, and the question was whether Lord Cranworth's Act applied to such income, or was only applicable to income actually vested in the infant. The Court said that the more apt expression would have been "may become" than "may be," yet held the Act applicable. Now the difficulty is, first, that there was no necessity after that decision to alter the language of the statute to make it applicable to income of that kind, and secondly, if altered for that purpose, the proper alteration would have been to make that phrase "may be or become," as suggested in that judgment. But the law was altered after that case, and after George, In re, by striking out altogether any reference to the title of the infant to the income, and dealing with the income of any property to which he is contingently entitled, as it would seem, prima facie, to whomsoever such income may belong.—p 295.

BUCKLEY, J.—The decision of Fry, J. in Buckley's Estate, In re, decided upon sect. 26 of Lord Cranworth's Act, is only that that Act applied to gifts absolute or contingent, and not to gifts vested liable to be divested. The decision of North J. in Wells, In re, is that a person entitled to a vested interest for life is, on attaining twenty-one, the person ultimately entitled to the property within sub-sect. 2 of sect. 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. North, J. I think, thought as I do, that "property" means the income whose accumulations are being dealt with. The C.A. in Humphreys, In re, was again dealing with an immediate vested life interest. That decision approved Wells, In re, and, while I feel some difficulty by reason of the fact that the decision was rested upon finding in the will an expression of a contrary intention, within sub-sect. 3 of sect. 43, I do not think there is anything in it to preclude me from coming to the conclusion that "property" in sub-sect. 2 means that property whose accumulation has produced the fund. The Court in Humphreys, In re, left open the point which I have now to decide.—P. 478

JESSER, M.R.—It is said that this is a contract with the father as part of the settlement, and that it has been so decided in Mundy v. Howe (Earl). The decision referred to went a step further. It laid down that it was not only a contract with the father, but it was a contract which entitled the father to get rid of the rule of equity which said that a power or trust for the maintenance of the infants was to be exercised and used with a view to the benefit of the infants, and not for the benefit of the father, and therefore, if the father were able to maintain the children, it was not intended to relieve him from the liability so to do. That was held no doubt in the first case under a will; the benefit that the testator meant was a benefit to the child on principle. But it is difficult to see how the construction of a marriage settlement can be different from that of a will. That decision has been commented on several times, notably by Kinderseley, V.-C. in Ransome v. Burgess, and by Malins, V.-C. in Kerrison's Trusts, In re, and I think their criticisms are well founded. On the other hand, considering the number of times Mundy v. Howe (Earl) has been recognised in this Court, it is quite impossible now for this Court to say that that case is not law and not binding upon it. But it does appear to me, having regard to the dissatisfaction of so many judges, and considering the effect of that decision, that it is not part of our duty to carry it any further. In Ransome v. Burgess, as appears from the report, both in the authorised reports and in the Law Journal, this point was not argued, and was not decided by the judge, and, indeed, when he sums up the case, he states it thus (on p. 780): "If the language of the settlement is so framed as to express a trust to apply the income or any part of the income in maintaining the children, although the quantum of income to be so applied is left to the discretion of the trustees, the father is entitled to have whatever is proper and necessary for the maintenance of his children applied for that purpose without reference to his ability to maintain them, but if the language of the settlement expresses merely a power so to apply the income or any part thereof to the maintenance of the children, then the father is not so entitled." So that, as he states it, he takes it to be clear in the case before him that it was a trust, as he had already stated in a former part of his judgment, exactly like the case of Mundy v. Howe (Earl). Having, therefore, regard to this point having escaped notice, and to the decision of the Court, and having regard to the other points which I have mentioned, I think we are not bound to follow the decision in Ransome v. Burgess, and that decision is not supported by the authority of Mundy v. Howe (Earl), and is not supported by any independent principle—pp. 524, 525.

LINDLEY, J.—Then when you come to the case before Kindersley, V.-C. [Ransome v. Burgess], I confess I am unable to distinguish that case from the present. But then he did this, he extended, and in my opinion erroneously extended, the previous decisions. Taking the principles correctly, he put a construction on the clause which I confess I do not think the word warranted, and I decline to be a party to extending the rule he followed—p. 528. Miller v. Blankley (1878) 38 L. T. 527.
 GROVE, J.—Of the Chancery cases cited the strongest in favour of the defendant is the second of the two bankruptcy cases I have mentioned, viz., Lynch, Ex parte, Lynch, In re [(1876) 15 L. J. Bk. 48, 2 Ch. D. 227. See "BANKRUPTCY," col. 97]. In that case the facts were, that an infant trader gave two acceptances in respect of money due for goods sold and delivered to him, which were dishonoured. After he came of age the creditors in respect of such goods presented a bankruptcy petition against him, the act of bankruptcy alleged being, that he had, a fortnight before he came of age, filed a liquidation petition under which the creditors had failed to come to any resolution. And it was held that the petitioning creditors were entitled to an adjudication of bankruptcy. I am far from saying that this case is not distinguishable from the one we are dealing with. But both the County Court judge, and the chief judge on appeal, decided on the ground which is laid here, that if an infant has been held out and dealt with as a trader, he can be made a bankrupt in respect of a trade debt, although they also decided on another ground. We cannot, however, upon the authority of that case come to a decision wholly different from that arrived at in Bartlett v. Wells and De Roo v. Foster. No case has been cited which goes the length of saying that, to an action in respect of a debt contracted in the course of trading during infancy, the defence of infancy cannot be set up. All the Chancery authorities cannot be reconciled because Stikeman v. Dawson is an authority for deciding as we are doing. That case was stronger one against the infant than this, in that the party dealt with him under the supposition that he was of full age, which is not stated in the plaintiff's evidence in this case. Yet there it was held that a man cannot be charged, after his majority, in respect of his dealings during his minority, merely because the other party, in consequence of such dealing, believed he was not a minor—p. 529.

COTTON, L.—There is no case in point except Hind v. Whitmore, in which there is an expression of opinion by Wood, V.-C., that the rule ought not to be extended to such a case as we have before us. But a married woman stands now on a different footing from that on which she stood at that time. She can sue without a next friend by leave of the Court under Ord. XVI. r. 8, with or without security for costs, as the Court may direct. Therefore it cannot be said that she is prevented from suing because she cannot find a next friend. We must, therefore, lay down the rule that a married woman cannot be allowed to bring a fresh action till the costs of the former suit are paid. She must take care to select a next friend who is a responsible person.—p 290.

KINDERLEY, V.-C.—Furtado v. Furtado was an appeal, on the ground of irregularity, from an order removing a next friend on a motion by a former solicitor for the infant in that suit. The next friend had appeared, by counsel, on the motion, and, as the chancellor remarked, might have consented to the removal. The dismissal of the appeal in Furtado v. Furtado depended, therefore, on the peculiar circumstances of the case, and did not set aside the general rule.—ib.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—I must use the freedom to observe, that whatever opinion the Scotch judges may justly form of the decision of this House in Johnstone v. Beattie, they would have acted with more dignity and more magnanimously as well as more judicially, if they had calmly and promptly considered what was for the benefit of the infant, and had recollected that a Court may not only be censured for exceeding its jurisdiction, but for declining to exercise its jurisdiction for the relief of a suitor, from the apprehension that in another cause its jurisdiction has been unjustifiably encroached upon by another Court. I can take upon myself to say, that Johnstone v. Beattie, whether properly or improperly decided, is no authority whatever for the interlocutor . . . appealed against . . .

There is only one other case which I think I can call upon to notice—Dawson v. Jay, before Cranworth, L.O. As at first stated at the bar, it certainly seemed closely in point, and it alarmed me much, for we were told that an American infant, who had a guardian regularly appointed by the Supreme Court at New York, having been fraudulently brought to England against the will of the guardian, Lord Cranworth had refused to interfere, and would not order the infant to be delivered up to the injured guardian. But the case being examined, it turns out that the infant came to England with the entire concurrence of the guardian originally appointed, who continued guardian at the time of the removal, and that it was another guardian, afterwards appointed, with doubtful regularity, who wished to get possession of the infant, and carry her back to America after she had been living several years in England. It further appeared that she was a British subject, although born in America, and the L.C. was thus called upon, without any offence being imputed to her, to sentence her to transportation to America by the decree of a Court of Equity.—pp. 63, 64.

LORD CRANWORTH—I would make a passing observation upon Johnstone v. Beattie. Perhaps it might have been a decision more consonant with the principles of general law to have held there that every country would recognise the status of guardian in the same way as they would undoubtedly recognise the status of parent or the status of husband and wife. But supposing that not to have been the view taken by the House, then there is nothing in that decision of Johnstone v. Beattie, that could have been decided otherwise, or that could at all interfere with or touch the present question, for all that was decided there was, that the status of guardian not being a status recognised by the law of this country unless constituted in the country, it was not a matter of course to appoint a foreign guardian to be English guardian, but was only a matter to be taken into consideration. That was all that was decided in that case.—p. 67. LORDS WENSLEYDALE, CHELMSFORD and KINGSDOWN concurred.

Stourton*, "received religious impressions to a depth and an extent tending dangerous and improper any attempt at important changes in them," and so to satisfy ourselves that the father is about to abuse his parental authority by seeking to disturb such religious convictions. F v. F. (1902) 71 L. J. Ch. 115, [1902] 1 Ch. 588.

FARWELL, J.—The principles on which the Court acts in cases of this class are well settled. First, the father's religion is prima facie, the infant's religion—religio sequitur patrem—and the guardian's duty is to see that the ward is brought up in that religion, and is safeguarded against disturbing influences by any one holding the tenets of a different faith—Newbery, In re, and Besant, In re. Secondly, the Court, in considering the question of guardianship has regard before all things to the infant's welfare. It has regard, of course, to the rights of the father and mother, but the essential requirements of the infant are paramount—Christie, In re (supra, col. 1317). Thirdly, it is by no means in cases of misconception only that the Court interferes to remove a guardian. Thus, in X, In re, X v. Y, which was cited as an authority in favour of the guardian, which really has no application, the C.A. held on the facts that there was nothing calculated to prejudice the infant in that case—p. 116.

SELWYN, L.J.—At some future period of this case, upon a motion, as in Hills v. Croll, or at the hearing of the cause, circumstances may be shown which render it improper for the Court to interfere; it may be shown either that the plaintiff has placed himself in such a situation that he ought not to be allowed to exercise his right, or that the defendant had not notice of the covenant when he purchased the property, and then possibly Hills v. Croll may have some application, though, in my opinion, it is very difficult to recognize that case with Lumley v. Wagner, which has been repeatedly followed, and if Hills v. Croll is to stand with that case at all, it can only be upon its particular circumstances—p 660.

GIFFARD, J.—With respect to Hills v. Croll, that case, as was said by Lord St Leonards in his judgment in Lumley v. Wagner, was decided according to its particular circumstances. Unless it is to be taken as laying down that the Court is to refuse to act on a negative covenant wherever there is a correlative obligation which it cannot enforce, it does not apply, if it is taken as going that length, it is contrary to Lumley v. Wagner, and must be considered as overruled—p 662.

Wolverhampton and Walsall Ry. v. L. & N. W. Ry. (1873) L. R. 16 Eq. 133, 43 L. J. Ch. 131. RIDGEMAN, L.C. (for ROMILLY, M.R.)—With regard to Lumley v. Wagner, to which reference was made, really when it comes to be examined it is not a case which tends in any way to limit the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court to do justice between parties by way of injunction. It was sought in that case to enlarge the jurisdiction on a highly artificial and technical ground, and to extend it to an ordinary case of hiring and service, which is not properly a case of specific performance. The technical distinction being made that if you find the word "not" in the agreement—"I will not do a thing"—as well as the words "I will," even although the negative term might have been implied from the positive, yet the Court, refusing to act on an implication of the negative, will act on the expression of it. I can only say that I should think it the safer and the better rule, if it should eventually be adopted by the Court, to look in all such cases to the substance and not to the form. If the substance of the agreement is such that it would be violated by doing the thing sought to be prevented, then the question will arise, whether this is the Court to come to for a remedy. If it is, I cannot think that ought to depend on the use of a negative rather than an affirmative form of expression. If, on the other hand, the substance of the thing is such that the remedy ought to be sought elsewhere, then I do not think the form ought to be changed by the use of a negative rather than an affirmative.—p 140.

PRY, J.—It appears to me that the tendency of recent decisions, and especially Fothergill v. Rowland and Wolverhampton and Walsall Ry. v. L. & N. W. Ry. is towards this view—that the Court ought to look at what is the nature of the contract between the parties, that if the contract as a whole is the subject of equitable jurisdiction, then an injunction may be granted in support of the contract whether it contains or does not contain a negative stipulation, but that if, on the other hand, the breach of the contract is properly satisfied by damages, then that the Court ought not to interfere whether there be or be not the negative stipulation. That, I say, appears to me to be the point towards which the authorities are tending, and I cannot help saying that in my judgment that would furnish a proper line by which to divide the cases. But the question which I have to determine is not whether that ought to be the way in which the line should be laid down, but whether it has been so laid down by the authorities which are binding on me—p 837. And see post, col 1325.

WILLS, J.—It is certainly true, as has been argued, that the Court will decline to interfere by injunction where the plaintiff fails to do that which he has promised to do as part of the contract. An instance of this is afforded by Frechter v. Montgomery. . . In that case the plaintiff was bound to give the defendant a reasonable opportunity of acting, and failed to do so.—p. 180.

WRIGHT, J.—The contract contains a negative stipulation which the plaintiff seeks to enforce by injunction. Until the decision in Dowell v. Bennett, the doctrine in accordance with which such stipulations were enforced by injunction was seriously interfered with by the supposed rule that, where there could be no device for specific performance of a contract on the one side, there ought to be no injunction on the other side; but since the decision in Dowell v. Bennett this view has been somewhat altered.—p. 132

ROMER, J.—In my opinion the injunction asked for by the notice of motion ought not to be granted. The application is based on clause 3 of the agreement between the parties, which contains a negative stipulation, and so far distinguishes this case from that of Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman. As the present M.R. stated in Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, cases where negative stipulations in contracts of service are enforced by the Court ought not to be extended, and are to be regarded as anomalies which it would be very dangerous to extend. To enforce such a general negative stipulation as I find here would be, in my opinion, a dangerous extension, for here the stipulation extends to business of any kind, while the negative stipulations enforced in the prior cases, such as Lumley v. Wagner, were confined to special services.—p. 320

Kirk v. The Queen (1873) L. R. 14 Eq. 658.

WICKENS, V.-C.—East Lancashire Ry. v. Hatterley, the only authority which was cited for it, seems, I agree with Sir Roundell Palmer, to have proceeded to some extent on the consent or submission of the parties. It is not at all clear to me that Wigram, V.-C., would or could have made any order on it, if the parties had stood on then extreme rights; and there was at least consent enough to make an appeal impossible. Moreover, it was a single case, and a part of the reasoning in the judgment was, I think, not unfavourably criticised by Sir Roundell Palmer. It was, no doubt, suggested by the Solicitor-General that this is a trespass in respect of which the Courts of law would, in the existing state of the law, grant an injunction in an action of trespass. The mere fact that it is a continuing trespass, in the sense in which this is a continuing trespass, seems to me in no way conclusive, and I should observe that the power of the Courts of law to grant an injunction in a case of this sort, is rather against than in favour of the supposition, that the Court of Chancery has the jurisdiction. Certainly I decline for the first time to hold that there is such a jurisdiction, though I entirely agree with the Solicitor-General that it would be very convenient, and that it would be very much better if the Court had it.—p. 570.

BRETT, L.J.—No case has, I think, gone beyond what my own views on the subject are, unless it be Aslett v. Southampton Corporation, where apparently an injunction was granted in a case in which no Court before the Judicature Act would have granted an injunction; but it is not a case in which before the Judicature Act no Court would have given any remedy, because obviously before that Act there was a remedy by a quo warranto. In Malmesbury Ry. v. Budd the M.R. issued an injunction, but it was on the ground that the arbitrator had been guilty of corruption. And in Beddo v. Beddo the M.R. also issued an injunction, but that was on the ground that the arbitrator had been guilty of misconduct, the misconduct in that case being that the arbitrator, after he had assumed his authority as arbitrator, had become indebted to one of the suitors without the knowledge of the other side. Now I will not enter upon the case of Hedley v. Bates (post, col. 1331), because it is one about which there has been considerable discussion, and it is one about which the M.R. himself has said that he did not think he had so expressed himself as to make what he intended as clear as almost all his judgments are. Therefore the only case which goes beyond my own personal inclination as to the construction of this section is Aslett v. Southampton Corporation, and I doubt whether that case is rightly decided, but it is not now necessary to determine this. It seems to me that the dicta of James and Thesiger, L.JJ. in Day v. Brownrigg (supra, col. 1327) and Gaskin v. Balls are quite sufficient if authority were wanted for what we are now deciding.—p. 87.

WICKENS, V.-C.—But for this case I should have considered it perfectly well settled that the Court of Chancery will not restrain by injunction the publication of a libel. What was said by Lord Ellenborough in Dubois v. Beresford (supra), "that the L.C. would grant an injunction against the exhibition of a libellous picture," has been expressly disavowed by Lord Campbell in Austria (Emperor) v. Day (supra), and is inconsistent with the dictum of Lord Eldon in Gee v. Pritchard (supra), with that of Lord Langdale in Clark v. Freeman (supra), and with that of Sir L. Shadwell in Martin v. Wright (supra), and, lastly, it seems to me inconsistent with what may be clearly discovered to have been Lord Cottenham's opinion in Fleming v. Newton (1848) 1 H. L. Cas. 363, for which opinion, it may be observed, he gives very strong reasons. Dixon v. Holden has introduced a rule which, if not contrary to the doctrine of these cases, affords at least a very material qualification of it. It was laid down in that case that the Court will restrain the publication of a libel where it affects property or the potentiality of acquiring property, at least where the potentiality of acquiring property is professional or commercial. It is not for me to say that the rule so laid down is erroneous; but I think it was wholly new, and that nothing whatever was said in Austria (Emperor) v. Day, or in any other case, except possibly in the peculiar and very different case of Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley (supra), which supports it in any way.

Routh v. Webster (supra) and Clark v. Freeman (col. 1328), approved.

CAIRNS, L.C. (after referring to Gee v. Pritchard (supra, col. 1329), Austria (Emperor) v. Day (supra), Clark v. Freeman, Martin v. Wright (col. 1329), Malkern v. Ward (supra), and Fleming v. Newton (supra), continued. The only shadow of authority the other way is in Dixon v. Holden, decided by Malins, V.-C. in the year 1869. I say nothing about the decision in that particular case, and I do not mean to say that the decision is not capable of being maintained. It professes to proceed mainly upon a case of Routh v. Webster, because I observe that the V.-C. says (at p. 493), "Routh v. Webster is an authority going the whole length of what is asked here. In that case a joint stock company was established, having for its only object the carrying passengers by steamboat and omnibus at a cheap rate. The defendants, the provisional directors, had published prospectuses in which the name of the plaintiff was used without his authority as a trustee of the company. They also paid Morley's into the bankers of the company to the plaintiff's account as trustee." That case appears, if I may say so, to have been quite rightly decided. The difficulties in which the plaintiff might have been placed, especially at the time when that case was decided, looking at what was supposed then to be the state of the law as to such undertakings, are obvious; and he was held entitled to restrain, not any libel, for there was no libel, but that improper and unauthorised use of his name. It was upon the authority of that case that Dixon v. Holden was professed to be decided, but the V.-C. went further, and said this (at p. 492) "The business of a merchant is about the most valuable kind of property that he can well have. Here it is the source of his fortune, and, therefore, to be injured in his business is to be injured in his property. But I go further, and say, if it had only injured his reputation it is within the jurisdiction of this Court to stop the publication of a libel of this description, which goes to destroy his property or his reputation, which is his property, and, if possible, more valuable than other property. In this case I go on general principle, and I am fortified by authority. General principle is in favour of it, but authority is not wanting." And further on the V.-C. says (at p. 491). "In the decision I arrive at I beg to be understood as laying down, that this Court has jurisdiction to prevent the publication of any letter, advertisement, or other document, which, if permitted to go on, would have the effect of destroying the property of another person, whether that consists of tangible or intangible property, whether it consists of money or reputation." Now, in these opinions the V.-C. conceived that he was fortified by authority. The authorities cited are, Fleming v. Newton, which appears to me to be an authority exactly to the contrary. Routh v. Webster, which was an authority for preventing the improper use of a man's name against his will, Clark v. Freeman, where the injunction was refused, and where Lord Langdale said the Court would not interfere to prevent a libel, and the only other case mentioned, Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, decided by the V.-C. himself, upon which of course the learned judge must be taken to have expressed the same opinion as he expressed in Dixon v. Holden. I am unable to accede to these general propositions. They appear to me to be at variance with the settled practice and principles of this Court, and I cannot accept them as an authority for the present application. —p. 146. JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ. concurred.

JESSEL, M.R.—Where the legislature has pointed out a mode of proceeding before a magistrate it is not, as a general rule, for another Court to interfere to stop that proceeding by injunction.

I refer to that more particularly because Hedley v. Bates, which I decided when sitting at the Rolls, was cited as an authority for the exercise of such a jurisdiction. In the first place, as I read Hedley v. Bates, it decided no such thing. In that case there was a manifest and admitted trespass, as will be seen by looking at pp. 499 and 500 of the report, and the Court, having to decide the question between the parties, went on to say that it was convenient to decide the other question—that is, whether or not the provisions of the Act of Parliament applied to the case in question. The magistrates there had no jurisdiction unless a certain notice was given, and the real question I had to decide was whether a valid notice had been given or could be given, and then it was said that that question must be decided by the magistrates when the case should come before them, which it must, and the answer was, "That may be so, but where the whole matter is before the Court in the first instance, and the Court has power to decide whether the magistrates had jurisdiction, it is much more convenient, instead of granting a prohibition, to grant an injunction between the same parties." But the whole doctrine which I laid down (as I thought clearly) in Healey v. Bates, was depen-

JAMES, J.J.—In old times this Court might well have been asked to interfere with criminal proceedings taken against an officer of the Court for the purpose of harassing him, as he had no other sufficient protection. There is an old decision referred to in the note to Franchlin v. Chikona (1819) (3 Swans 276, 280, n), that restraining and killing a sequester was not murder. At that time, therefore, the Court had cause to interfere with criminal proceedings, but the cause for so doing has now ceased. The authority produced to us [York Corporation v. Pilkington], is, as far as I know, the only case in which this Court has made such an order as we are now asked to make; and often that case is not exactly similar, because it appears that the same right would there have been tried in both Courts—p. 66 from me on the construction of the statute. The case as to an injunction is simply reported by saying that the appeal against the refusal of the injunction was dismissed with costs. In that case I explained, somewhat in the same way that I gave to-day, what the meaning of Healey v. Bates was, and I refused the injunction in that case, because I said the Court is not seized of the case otherwise. It is a mere case of prohibition, and there is no reason for changing the mode of proceeding from prohibition to injunction, where you are not compelled to decide the question on other grounds between the same parties, and in that case having refused that injunction, that refusal was affirmed by the Court of Appeal—p. 196.

appealed from, and the L.J.J. thought it a right decision. With the exception of that case before Lord Hardwicke, there is no instance in which a Court of equity has interfered in criminal proceedings. I do not say that the Court might not interfere in a possible case, but as a general rule it will not. Then I come to the question whether there is any equity at all. Now I have been referred to Auekland (Lord) v. Westminster Local Board of Works, and, speaking with all deference to the eminent judges who decided it, it appears to me that sufficient attention was not paid to the real facts of that case. The L.J.J. dealt with the case as if the Westminster Board of Works had threatened to pull down what they had no right to pull down, and that being a wrongful act, they felt no doubt as to their jurisdiction to restrain it. If that had been the case here, I should, without that decision, have granted an injunction, just as in the case of a railway company exceeding its powers. But, on reading the report, that was not the real state of the case at all. The Westminster Board of Works had not threatened to pull down the houses, but to apply to a magistrate for an order to pull down, and such an order could not have been made except by a magistrate having jurisdiction to make it; so that the application was really to restrain the Board, not from pulling down—as both the L.J.J. treated it—but from applying to a magistrate for an order to pull down. Consequently the judgment in that case has, in fact, no real application to the present case. I cannot, therefore, treat that as a decision upon the question whether a Court of equity will restrain an application to a magistrate for an order to pull down; it decided a totally different point, and I therefore cannot consider it as an authority applicable to the present case—p. 467.

COTTON, L.J.—The late M.R. there expressed an opinion that there ought not to an enquiry as to damages unless the plaintiff had been guilty of some default in obtaining the injunction. Probably he did not mean his remarks to apply to a case like this, where, if the injunction was improperly granted, it would not be because the judge made a mistake, but because the plaintiff's evidence was not true. But I am of opinion that his dictum is not well founded, and that the rule is, that whenever the undertaking is given, and the plaintiff ultimately fails on the merits, an inquiry as to damages will be granted unless there are special circumstances to the contrary—p. 477.

NORTH, J.—Then the point was suggested by Mr. Bazalgette that at any rate, if the motion by the defendants to discharge the order in other respects was right, yet, inasmuch as it was only made on the day on which the order itself would expire (as a matter of fact it was the day before), the motion could not have served any useful purpose, and therefore the defendants ought to pay the costs of it. A case [Bolton v. London School Board] was referred to by Mr. Bazalgette, in which that course was followed, of dismissing with costs a motion to dissolve an order that died on the evening of the day on which the motion was made. To begin with, it appears to me that that was not a case of moving to discharge a motion for irregularity. That seems to me to make a great difference between that case and this.
Independently of that, even if I had taken the view that that case, so far as it went, was an authority in favour of the proposition for which Mr. Bazalgette cited it, it still would not have led to the result he suggests, because the order in this case contains not merely an injunction but also an undertaking by the plaintiff to abide by any order the Court might make as to damages.—p. 425

LINDLEY, L.J.—The appellant's counsel have argued very strenuously that there is no jurisdiction, and have based their contention upon a passage in Lord Eldon's judgment in Iverson v. Harris. That was a case of a prohibition, and Lord Eldon differed from a decision of the Court of Ex. in another case upon the question who was bound by a prohibition. He said "I have no conception that it is competent to this Court to hold a man bound by an injunction who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause. The old practice was that he must be brought into Court, so as according to the ancient laws and usages of the country to be made a subject of the writ." That strikes me as perfectly correct. Lord Eldon was addressing himself to the question who the persons were who were bound by an injunction, he was not referring to persons who assisted others in committing breaches of an injunction.—p. 271.

I am sure the V.-C. never laid down, or intended to lay down, any such proposition. FOLLOCK, O.B. (for the Court).—Then, being, for those reasons, of opinion that the action will lie against the executors if it would have done so against the testator, it remains to consider whether the direction to the jury was correct. We think it was. The objection was that it assumed the defendants were liable if there was negligence in the plaintiff, and that therefore the defendants would be liable, though not only not negligent, but even diligent. But we think that is the law. It is true the expression in the forms in "tort" is, that the loss was "propter defectum" of the innkeeper, but we think the cases show that there is a defect in the innkeeper, wherever there is a loss not arising from the plaintiff's negligence, the act of God, or the Queen's enemies. The only case that points the other way is Dawson v. Gurney, as reported 5 Q. B. 161. According to the report, however, of that case in 7 Jur 1037, "there was no evidence of the manner in which the horse received the injury for which the action was brought." This may be the explanation of that case, for though damage happening to the horse from what occurred in the stable might be evidence of defectum or neglect, still if it was not shown how the damage arose, it was not even shown that it arose from what occurred in the stable. This would reconcile that case to the general current of authorities.—p. 277

A. L. SMITH, L. J.—I cannot do better than read the words of Loyes, L. J. in Gordon v. Silber, with which I thoroughly agree. "The innkeeper is under an obligation to keep the goods of a guest received into the inn safely and securely, and can be sued and made liable in damages if he fails to do so." As a compensation for the burden thus imposed upon him the law has given him a lien upon the goods of the guest until he discharges the expenses of his lodging and food. If the guest has brought goods to the inn to which he has no title, this will not deprive the innkeeper of his lien, because he is obliged to receive the guest without inquiries as to his title." It has been argued that that principle does not apply if the property in the goods be not in the guest, but in his employer, and that fact be known to the innkeeper, and that Broadwood v. Granara has so decided. In my opinion that case does not so decide. There the piano was not brought as the luggage of the guest, or anything of that kind; but here all the sewing-machines were received as the luggage of the commercial traveller, which the innkeeper was bound to take in. The question of pledge has nothing to do with this case, and the only question is what is the custom of the realm? With knowledge we have not to deal, for there is no authority that the lien given by the law of the realm is abrogated if the innkeeper knew that the goods were not the property of his guest. Knowledge makes no difference, and if half the goods were the guest's, but all were brought as his luggage, the obligation of the innkeeper would be the same throughout.—p. 667.

LORD BLACKBURN.—There was a subsequent case, which has not been cited, which proceeded upon an error and has been since overruled (I mean Godsall v. Boldero), where a person had insured the life of Mr. Pitt, having no other interest in his life than as a creditor of Mr. Pitt, which gave him an interest, and the House of Commons voted out of pure grace and avour a large sum of money to pay Mr. Pitt's debts, and the executor paid this debt. The insurance company set up the defence that this was a contract of indemnity and that Mr. Pitt's debt having been paid there could not be a right to recover against them. Lord Ellenborough, falling into a blunder which has been since corrected, thought that the contract of life insurance was a contract of indemnity, and accordingly held that that was a good defence on the part of the insurance company. I have been old by people connected with insurance companies and other people with whom I have been brought into contact in the course of my professional experience, that no sooner had that been done than here was such an outcry that every one said he would never insure with a company which was capable of doing such a shabby thing. Consequently the insurance company instantly paid the whole loss and the whole of the costs, and published everywhere that they had done so. Nevertheless Lord Ellenborough's decision stood until it was decided in the Ex. Ch. [Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Co, post] that that case went altogether upon a mistaken idea that a contract of life insurance was a contract of indemnity, whereas it was nothing of the kind. But if it had been a contract of indemnity, the part of Parliament to pay Mr. Pitt's debts would have prevented the man's sustaining any loss by the death of Mr. Pitt, and consequently the decision would have been right.—p. 340

Thomson v. Weems (1884) 9 App. Cas. 671.—H.L. (SC.).

LORD BLACKBURN.—Those whose business it is to insure lives calculate on the average rate of mortality, and charge a premium which on that ordinary average will prevent their being losers. There are some expressions used by the judges in the Court of Session in the case of Hutchinson, which would seem to lay it down, at least when it is the party's own life that is assured, that it is illegal, or at least so absurd that no one would make such a contract, to engage that if the life is such that the risk is of the ordinary kind, the insurer shall be bound, but that if there is a disease tending to shorten life, such as to make it not of the ordinary risk, the insurer shall not be bound, whether the assured knew it or not. I cannot agree to this, it seems to me a very reasonable stipulation on the part of the insurer, and that it is not at all absurd or improper on the part of the assured to assent to such being a term of the contract. It is seldom that a derangement of one important function can have gone so far as to amount to disease without some symptoms having developed themselves, but the insurers have a right if they please to take a warranty against such disease, whether latent or not, and it has very long been the course of business to insert a warranty to that effect.

In Duché v. Williams, in 1834, it was held, on reasoning to my mind irresistible, that in a declaration substantially, as far as regards this point, the same as this, what was untrue, so as to leave the effect of avoiding the insurance, was also untrue so as to cause the forfeiture of the premium. In Anderson v. Fitzgerald (post, col. 1850), Lord de Leonards points out very strongly that where such a consequence would follow from a warranty, before a contract is held to have the effect of a warranty, it is necessary to see that the language is such as to show that the assured as well as the insurer meant it, and that the language in the policy being that of the insurers, if there is any ambiguity it must be construed most strongly against them. But he never questioned that if there was a warranty, and it was not fulfilled, it avoided the policy. And with the exception of Hutchinson's Case . . . I think that in every case in which moral guilt was thought an element in the question of true or untrue, it has always been on the ground that the contract was such as not sufficiently to show that there was an agreement on the part of the assured that there should be a warranty. In Forster's Case, I think there was very strong ground for saying that it was not shown that the assured contracted that her answers to a medical man selected by the company, who was to examine her alone and report to them confidentially the conclusion to which he came, were warranted to be accurate; the very object of the examination would be frustrated if the patient were not to answer frankly and without reserve to the questions she was asked.—p. 681.

BACON, V.-C.—In Lea v. Hinton the defendant as surety and creditor effected an insurance for the purpose of indemnifying himself, and received a large sum on the policy than was necessary for those purposes. It was there held that he was not entitled to retain more than was sufficient to repay him, and that the surplus belonged to the estate of the debtor against whom he had charged all that he had paid. In Drysdale v. Piggott a similar decision was made, although there all the premiums had been paid by the creditor who had insured, and notwithstanding that the debtor had refused to pay the premium when required to do so, and Courtenay v. Wright is to the like effect. But in all those cases the relation of debtor and creditor was indisputable, and the ground of this decision was that the insurance being only to secure the debt the creditor had no interest after the debt was paid. . . . Gottlieb v. Cranch, often referred to, and, as I conceive, never questioned, explains and establishes the principles applicable to cases like the present. And although in the more recent case of Knox v. Turner, Stuart, V.-C. expressed considerable doubt as to the grounds upon which some of the preceding decisions had been arrived at, yet, feeling himself bound by those decisions, he dismissed the bill of a plaintiff who, under circumstances not distinguishable from the present, except that he had purchased an annuity which the grantee had protected by effecting an insurance, sought to compel the grantee to transfer to him the policy. The V.-C. in his judgment so expressed himself as to encourage an appeal, an appeal was brought, and, being heard before Lord Hatherley, was by him unhesitatingly dismissed. It must, I think, therefore be considered as fully established upon authority that a grant of an annuity like that in the present case is a transaction perfectly lawful and perfectly plain, that whatever be the right of re-purchase, no relation of debtor and creditor is thereby created; that the indemnity which the grantee thinks fit to make for himself does not constitute a security in which the grantor has any right or interest; and that the claim of the plaintiff to have the proceeds of the policy brought into the account as if the original plaintiff could have claimed any interest in it, wholly fails.—p. 769.

 dition create a charge in his own favour as against his mortgagee. I was referred to two cases which undoubtedly appear at first sight somewhat to support the contention. The cases are West v. Reid and Shearman v. British Empire Insurance Co. It is enough for me to say but in neither of these two cases does it appear to me that the point for which they were cited to me was the subject-matter of discussion and decision. In West v. Reid the point in controversy was abandoned at the bar. In Shearman v.
British Empire Insurance Co. an offer had been made, which was not withdrawn from, and upon which the M.R. acted. It is quite true that he makes an observation there that it was a charge, but, looking at his previous decision in Clack v. Holland (supra), I very much doubt whether his lordship meant to determine that question. Certainly that point does not appear to have been argued, the question for argument being whether a person who had made a salvage payment was entitled to the entirety of the fund; and an offer having been made to give the defendant the portion of the fund which represented the actual payment, and that offer apparently never having been withdrawn, the case was decided on that ground. These are authorities therefore which do not appear to me, to sustain the proposition for which they were cited.—J. 829

 These [Shearman v. British Empire Mutual Assurance Co. (supra)], undoubtedly, the M.R. gave to a bankrupt mortgagee credit for premiums paid after the bankruptcy, and a lien for the amount of the premiums, but for what reason does not appear at all in the report. All that the reporter has told us is this, that the M.R. said that the plaintiff, the mortgagee, was clearly entitled to the policy moneys, but that the premiums paid subsequently to the bankruptcy were in the nature of salvage moneys, and the plaintiff must repay them to the legal personal representative of the mortgagee with interest upon them. Fry, L.J., in Saunders v. Dunman (supra), has suggested, and I think it is highly probable that is the correct explanation, that the decision went on the ground—that previously to the institution of the suit the plaintiff, the mortgagee of the policy, had offered to pay the legal personal representative a sum larger than the amount of the premiums with interest thereon at 1 per cent. That very probably is the ground of the decision. But if the M.R. meant to express an opinion that a person having no interest in a policy can, by payment of the premiums, acquire a lien on the policy, I am bound to say I differ from that view. The real explanation of the case (Gill v. Dawson), in my opinion, is not that permission was given to persons who paid these premiums without authority to claim a lien for the amount of the premiums either on the income or the capital, but that the only question was, whether payment was to be made to them immediately, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation. That restraint on anticipation would not have prevented the trustees from paying the premiums, and it did not prevent repayment to the mortgagees who paid them. The V.-C. there (Glynn v. Wiffy) refused to apply the doctrine alleged by the respondents to be essentially applicable to these cases, that a person whose expenditure has saved the property has a lien.—pp. 246, 247. BOWEN, L.J. concurred.

WYLLIE, L.J. (who also concurred).—It appears that the expression "salvage moneys," so we are informed by one of the learned counsel for the appellants, and I dare say he is quite right, first occurs in the report of Thorp, In re, which was before Lord St. Leonards in 1852, where he seems to have used the expression as one familiar to the Irish Courts in certain cases. I certainly wish that the expression had remained on the other side of the Channel, where it seems to have arisen. I doubt whether any doctrine which is expressed by the word "salvage" applies to cases of this description.—p. 254.

NORTH, J.—I think that Fry, L.J. intended, in Leslie, In re, to lay down exhaustively the cases in which a person who pays a premium in respect of a policy of insurance will be entitled to a lien upon the proceeds of the policy, and that he meant to say that a trustee would not be entitled to a lien in any other case than that which he mentioned.—p. 23.

COTTON, L.J.—What we have to consider, therefore, is this: whether there is anything to justify the finding of the M.R. that there was any default or neglect to pay the money by the defendant company. If there was not, then the principle on which interest should be granted—that is, by way of damages—fails. The M.R. followed his former decision in Crossley v. City of Glasgow Life Assurance Co., which he thought decided this case upon many points. There the facts were very simple. In that case he gave, as he has given here, the assurance office all the costs as between solicitor and client, and he did so on the ground that they were justified in declining to pay the money without the decree of the Court. In the present case, it has not been questioned before us that the decree of the Court below gives a complete exoneration or discharge to the assurance office. It must not be assumed that we decide that that is so. That question is not before us, but it may hereafter arise. The M.R. in both cases decided that the decree of the Court would be a complete indemnity to the assurance office, upon this ground, that, although there was no legal personal representative to give a discharge to the office, yet he had the power to dispense with the presence of the legal personal representative, and that his decree, made in the absence of the legal personal representative under that power, would be a good discharge to the office. That is, in fact, a decision that until the decree the office could not reasonably be called upon to pay.—p. 176.

GOLARIDGE, C J.—In Webster v. British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Co., no doubt, James, L J said he was a little surprised at the decree having been made in the absence of the legal personal representative. But when the facts of that case are looked at they show a good reason for that observation. There the amount of an insurance on the life of an insured had been handed over to an equitable mortgagee in the absence of a legal personal representative of the mortgagor, the sum payable on the policy being largely in excess of the mortgage debt. The effect was to pay to the creditor a large surplus which belonged to the insolvent's estate. I should in that case have felt the same doubt which James, L J felt. Certainly Cotton, L J, went further, and appeared to doubt whether the order would give a complete discharge to the insurance company. I should have thought, if it had been necessary to decide the point, that the order would have given a complete discharge. At all events, those observations of the learned judges were only dicta, and do not throw any doubt on the jurisdiction of the Court in such a case as this.—p 537

JENSEN, M R.—In Hall, In re, LORD HATHERLEY, then V.-C., incorrectly, in my opinion, apprehended the effect of a policy of insurance. In that case an insurance company had paid in a sum of money under the Trustee Relief Act, and the V.-C. says, "that it had been held that mere stakeholders could pay in a fund under the Trustee Relief Act, and therefore the company were justified in so doing." He does not mention the authority where it had been so held, but even if that were so, a debtor is not in the position of a mere stakeholder, even where the creditor has dealt with the debt so as to make two claims to it. He may interplead, and in that sense, in that way, and to that extent, may be described incorrectly as a stakeholder, but that is a peculiar case, and an ordinary debtor cannot be considered a stakeholder. But when I come to look at Hall, In re, I find it was not an ordinary policy, it was a family policy, and it seems to have been thought that there was something peculiar or special about the case. The matter came before Lord Romilly in United Kingdom Life Assurance Co., In re. What happened there has happened, according to my experience, very often. An eminent Queen's Counsel, now BAGGALLAY, L J, and Mr. EVERETT, were counsel for the petitioners, and Mr. CALDECOTT was counsel for the respondents, the Aldermen, who brought in a claim, he took the point that they were not liable to pay the costs because the Trustee Relief Act did not apply. It was not the company who took the objection, but he took the objection to avoid the payment of costs, so that he was not in a very favourable position. Mr. WICKENS, for the insurance company, as to the right to pay in under the Trustee Act, cited Hall, In re. Then the M R said, "that he concurred with WOOD, v. C., that mere stakeholders might pay money into Court under the Trustee Relief Act, though they might not, strictly speaking, be termed trustees." He ordered the costs of the company of and relating to the payment into Court, and of this application, as between solicitor and client, and the costs of the petitioners, to be paid by the respondents, the Aldermen." So that he agreed that they were not trustees. He said they were mere stakeholders, and he concurred with WOOD, v. C. He did not really, as far as I can see, give a judicial judgment on the matter. It was a case in which he was not very anxious to decide favourably to the objecting party, and he ordered the respondents to pay the costs, which they ought to have paid in any event. No doubt it might have required a bill to make them pay them. That is all he decided. As I understand, he thought they were not strictly trustees, but that the Act applied to a mere stakeholder though not a trustee. Then when the matter came before Wood, V.-C., in Webb's Policy, In re, it came in this way: "There were some very important questions to be argued out between the parties. They did not object at all, it was principally desired to take the opinion of the Court, they all took the benefit of the payment into Court, they did not object to pay the costs of the company, but they did object to pay the costs as between solicitor and client, and that is how the question came to be decided. Mr. Wickens, for the assurance company, argued "that the company were entitled to costs as between solicitor and client. In an interpleader suit no doubt the plaintiff was entitled to costs only as between party and party, but the intention of the framers of the Trustee Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, s. 1) was not to substitute a proceeding for an interpleader suit. It was rather to substitute a proceeding for a suit to administer a trust, and to relieve persons who held moneys belonging to others in their hands," and he cited United Kingdom Life Assurance Co., In re. There Wood, V.-C. observed, "I think the question was argued before me, and decided in a case of Hall, In re." The argument on the other side was that the company were stakeholders, and were to have their costs as between party and party. The V.-C. consulted the M.R., the M.R. having relied upon him in Hall, In re, and what he says, is this: "I observe that in United Kingdom Assurance Co., In re, where the M.R. had to determine upon the propriety of payment into Court by an insurance company of the proceeds of a policy, his lordship decided that a stakeholder of this description came within the designation in the Act of 'trustees, executors, administrators or other persons, having in their hands any moneys belonging to any trust,' and he appears to have given the company their costs, as between solicitor and client, without any argument." Then, after saying that the M.R. agreed with him, he goes on "The object of the Act was to relieve not only trustees, executors, and administrators, but other persons having trust money in their hands, and to enable them to obtain a cheap and efficacious mode of having the rights of the parties settled. It is in every way desirable that this form of proceeding should be encouraged rather than otherwise." He does not decide they are trustees although they have trust moneys, but he says, "the M.R. has decided that it was desirable to encourage this form of proceeding," and that is all. I may say neither judge, in fact, said there was a trust—pp. 81—87.

WILLES, J.—In effect, there being no violation of the law, and no fraud in the insured, an increase of risk to the subject-matter of insurance, its identity remaining, though such increase of risk be caused by the insured, does not avoid the insurance. I may add, that there is a case of Sillem v. Thornton, which turned mainly upon a question of identity of the subject-matter intended to be assured, and which may be sustained on that ground, notwithstanding our present decision. That part of the judgment in that case which discusses the above point was not called for by the facts, and if it was intended to negative the proposition just stated, we ought to overrule it.—p. 445.

BRETT, L.J.—In Barnard v. Radocanachi (supra, col. 1843) the foundation of the judgment to which I assented was that what was paid by the United States Government could not be considered as salvage, but must be deemed to have been only a gift. It was only a gift to which the assured had no right at any time until it was placed in their hands.

Darrell v. Tibbitts seems to me to be entirely in favour of the plaintiff in this case. I shall not retract from the very terms which I used in that case. It seems to me that in Darrell v. Tibbitts the insurers were not subrogated to a right of action or to a remedy they were not subrogated to a right to enforce the remedy, but what they were subrogated into was the right to receive the advantage of the remedy which had been applied, whether it had been enforced or voluntarily administered by the person who was bound to administer it.—p. 386—391.

COTTON, L.J., to the same effect.

*BOWEN, L.J., who also concurred, said: "We have been asked to hold that a tenant from year to year can always recover the full value of the house from the insurance company, although he has intended to insure only his limited interest in it. There is some justification for that in the language of James, L.J. in Rayner v. Preston. He says this: 'In my view of the case it is perhaps unnecessary to refer to the Act of Parliament as to fire insurance. But that Act seems to me to show that a policy of insurance on a house was considered by the legislature, as I believe it to be considered by the universal consensus of mankind, to be a policy for the benefit of all persons interested in the property, and it appears to me that a purchaser having an equitable interest under a contract of sale is a person having an interest in the house within the meaning of the Act. I believe that there is no case to be found in which the liability of the insurance office has been limited to the value of the interest of the insured in the house destroyed. If a tenant for life having insured his house has the house destroyed or damaged by fire, I have never heard it suggested that the insurance office could cut down his claim by showing that he was of extreme old age or suffering from a mortal disease.' Now, with the greatest possible respect and reverence for all that is left to us of the judgments of a great judge like James, L.J., I confess I do not follow that. . . . It is true that in most cases the claim of a tenant from year to year, or for years, cannot be answered by handing over to him what may be the marketable value of his property, and the reason is that he insures more than the marketable value of his property, and he loses more than the marketable value of his property; he loses the house in which he is living, and the beneficial enjoyment of the house as well as its pecuniary value. That, I think, is all that was meant by the V.-C. in Simpson v. Scottish Union Insurance Company—p. 399.

COLLINS, J.—A point was made upon behalf of the defendant, based upon a dictum of Cotton, L.J. in Darrell v. Tibbitts, which raised, I think, the only material difficulty in this case. His lordship said: "If the company had known of the covenants in the lease, and of the actual position of the parties, it might have been said that they had paid without requiring the covenant to be enforced, and therefore had lost their remedy." In the present case the plaintiffs, when they paid the insurance money to the defendant, were thoroughly aware of all his rights against his lessor. They had seen the lease, and their attention had been called to the covenant, and therefore it becomes necessary to consider whether that fact distinguishes the case from Darrell v. Tibbitts, and obliges the plaintiffs to renounce such rights as they might have returned had they chosen to insist upon them at the time they paid the money. Cotton, L.J., in a later case, makes observations which seem to be somewhat inconsistent, not with the decision, but with the suggestion which he apparently makes in this passage. I have cited from Darrell v. Tibbitts. In . . . Castellain v. Preston, he says: "If the proposition is stated in that manner, it is clear that the office would be entitled to the benefit of anything recovered by the assured before the time when the policy is paid, and it is established by Darrell v. Tibbitts that the insurance company is entitled to that benefit whether or not before they pay the money they insist upon a calculation being made of what can be recovered in diminution of the loss by the assured, if they do not insist upon that calculation being made, and if it afterwards turns out that in consequence of something which ought to have been taken into account in estimating the loss, a sum of money or even a benefit, not being a sum of money, is received, then the office, notwithstanding the payment made, is entitled to say that the assured is to hold that for its benefit, and although it was not taken into account in ascertaining the sum which was paid, yet when it has been received it must be brought into account; and if it is not a sum of money, but a benefit that has been received, its value must be estimated in money." I have already dealt with the difference between a benefit actually received and a benefit lost, but subject to that difference, there is undoubtedly an expression of opinion by Cotton, L.J., that the fact that a company has paid with full knowledge of the facts does not detract them from requiring a subsequent account on the footing of a benefit which they knew of and had not dealt with in account when they paid. I do not myself see any principle upon which that exception or limitation could be placed unless they had so acted as to be estopped, and to make it inequitable for them to insist upon the position, which they must, by their conduct as between themselves and their assured, be deemed to have abandoned —p 665

CAMPBELL, C.J.—With regard to the opinion expressed by Lord St. Leonards, his book is a most valuable publication, and I pay respect to it; if it were proposed to make it law, I might be ready to support it; but it is only the opinion of a most learned judge, and it is contrary to a solemn decision, and to my own opinion —p. 720

CORTON, L.—If there had been no authority on the point, the matter would have possibly been more doubtful, but in several cases interest has been allowed on payments made both under express and implied contracts to indemnify. In Petre v. Duncombe, under a covenant by way of indemnity to a surety, interest was allowed by way of damages upon payments which had been made by the surety, it being held that on a contract to indemnify the person to be indemnified should be put in the same position as if the man who had contracted to indemnify him had in fact done what he had contracted to do, that is, had paid the money at the proper time. And Kinderley v. V.-C. in a very careful judgment in Hitchman v. Stewart, came to the same conclusion where there was only an implied contract by co-sureties to indemnify or repay another co-surety the amount which he had paid in excess of his fair proportion. There the Vice-Chancellor allowed interest on the ground that there was an implied contract to indemnify, following the old case of Latham v. Wright (1 Cox 275), where the point does not appear to have been argued, but interest was allowed under somewhat similar circumstances. That decision of Vice-Chancellor Kinderley's has been followed in the recent case of In re Swan's Estate, where the Court of Appeal in Ireland allowed interest under similar circumstances on the same principle on an implied contract to indemnify. Having regard to these authorities, and to the consideration that where there is a contract to indemnify, express or implied, the person who is to be indemnified ought to be put in the same position as if the act against which he is to be indemnified had been done by the person who is to indemnify him at the time when it ought to have been done, we are of opinion that the proof for interest ought to be admitted.—p. 421

HALL, V.-C.—The case of Mackintosh v. Great Western Railway Co. would seem to be an authority independently of the statute. Stuart, V.-C., however, did not in his judgment as to interest refer to the cases which I have already mentioned, but he seems to have gone on some earlier authorities which, in the cases to which I referred, were reviewed and considered to be no longer applicable at law. Under all the circumstances of that case, and treating that case as one of legal right, I do not consider that case as an authority in favour of the plaintiffs for the allowance of interest. The type of Mildmay v. Methuen was referred to. I do not consider that the decision in that case is satisfactory, or one which ought to guide me in coming to a conclusion in this case; if, independently of it, I should come to a different conclusion, which, under all the circumstances of this case, I certainly should come to. The circumstances of that case are not set forth, and there is nothing to explain what the nature of the deduction was. but even supposing that I could treat the present as a case within the 28th section, I do not find that that section is imperative. It merely empowers a jury, if "they shall think fit," to allow interest at a rate not exceeding a certain amount. Those words give a discretion to the jury to say whether the case is, under all the circumstances of it, one in which interest ought to be allowed or not. A new trial would not, I think, be granted, because the jury had not allowed interest under that section.—p. 560

Grove, J.—It was argued by Mr. Moor, and the argument is partly supported by the reasoning of Hall, V.-C. in *Hill v. LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—The argument before us in support of the demand has been chiefly rested upon the case of the Colombian Government v. Rothschild, and it has gone the length of maintaining that by the rules of procedure in Chancery a foreign republic is unable to institute a suit for the recovery of its own property in its own name, and being pressed to state in what manner the United States of America are to sue in our Courts, the counsel for the defendants said the only proper mode was in the name of their President. That, however, was not the view of Wood, V.-C. (L. R. 3 Eq. 124) (p. 586).

It was insisted that the case of the Colombian Government v. Rothschild, which was approved of by the House of Lords, had settled this question in defendants' favour. That case, however, seems to have proceeded upon grounds which render it wholly inapplicable to the purpose for which it was cited. The bill was filed in the name of the Government of the State of Colombia, and his Excellency Don Manuel José Hurtado, described as a citizen of the said State and Minister Plenipotentiary from the same to the Court of his Britannic Majesty, with the addition of his residence.

The bill having been demurred to, the Vice-Chancellor, Sir John Leach, allowed the demurrer. Now I do not understand this to be a decision that the State of Colombia could not be plaintiffs in a suit instituted for the recovery of the property of the State, much less that they could not sue unless they appointed some public officer, having himself no interest in the subject in litigation, to represent their rights. The Vice-Chancellor, by the words, "It must sue in the names of some public officers who are entitled to represent the interests of the State," must have referred to some persons or body in whom the interests of the State were vested, and who were, therefore, entitled to represent it in a suit. There was nothing upon the face of the bill to intimate whether the Government of Colombia was such a body, or, indeed, of whom it was composed, so that if the defendants had been desirous of filing a cross bill, they would have been wholly unable from information contained in the original bill to know upon whom process should be served.—p. 588

STIRLING, J—It [Lindo v Belisario] was the first case in which the validity of a Jewish marriage was considered by an Ecclesiastical Court. In dealing with it Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott) said: "This is a case which comes moderate knowledge of that law." That language would not have been inappropriate if the question before him had related to the capacity of the contracting parties as well as to the formalities of the marriage. In fact, however, the question related to the formalities only, it was one of intricacy and difficulty, and I am unable to find anything in the judgment which indicates that the observations to which I have referred were directed to anything beyond that which the learned judge was called on to decide; certainly I cannot look on them as an authority for the proposition that the capacity of members of the Jewish faith to contract marriage is regulated by their own law and not by the law of this country. The question in Reg v Milha [(1844) 10 Cl. & F 534; 8 Jur 717—H.L. (IR)] See "HUSBAND AND WIFE," supra, col 1195] was also one of form, and to it the remarks of Lord Brougham (see p 736) and Lord Campbell (see p 794), cited in argument, appear to have been addressed—pp 723, 724.

COTTON, L J [for the Court]—It only remains to consider the case of Simonin v Mallac. The objection to the validity of the marriage in that case, which was solemnized in England, was the want of the consent of the parents required by the law of France, but not under the circumstances by that of this country. In our opinion, this consent must be considered a part of the ceremony of marriage, and not a matter affecting the personal capacity of the parties to contract marriage; and the decision in Simonin v Mallac does not, we think, govern the present case—p 7

STIRLING, J—Those decisions [Johnson v Johnson's Administrator and Connolly v Woodrick] are not, of course, binding upon me, but they are entitled to most respectful consideration. I am not sure that the learned judges who decided those cases took the same view of the law as is expressed by Lord Penzance, by which I consider myself to be bound; but in both cases the facts were very different from those in the present case, and circumstances were proved which might, in my judgment, well lead to the conclusion, consistently with the doctrine laid down in Hyde v Hyde and Woodmansee, that the marriages there under consideration were valid according to the law of England.

LINDLEY, M.R.—That brings me to the second point . . . This is the question whether this settlement has become binding on this lady or not. She was an Irish lady. The settlement was executed at Bern in Switzerland and in the English language and with English trustees in the British Embassy, and it was executed previous to and in contemplation of her marriage with an Austrian gentleman. It was contemplated that after marriage they should, as they did, go and live in Austria—in other words, that she should become domiciled in Austria. Now, according to the English law this settlement by her was a voidable contract in the sense explained by the H. L. in Edwards v Carter, to which I will refer presently. She lived two or three years in Austria, and then became of age—twenty-one. By the Austrian law she was unable to ratify this contract or to confirm it or to place it out of her power to revoke it, and now we have to consider the consequences that arise. The position is simply that this lady never had either before or after marriage power to make an irrevocable settlement. Can we hold, therefore, that this settlement has become irrevocable? That is the paradox that is put to us. Cozens-Hardy, J. has taken this view of it. He says, first, that upon the authority of Van Gratten v Digby this was an English settlement to be governed by English law, and by the English law as expounded by the H. L. in Edwards v Carter. . . covenants in a marriage settlement or a settlement made on the marriage by infants are voidable, and become binding unless repudiated within a reasonable time. It is said that she always had power at all events to repudiate, and that she could do that by Austrian law, and that the English law cannot be applied to that state of things, and that meanwhile as she has not repudiated within a reasonable time this contract has become irrevocable. To my mind that is not sound reasoning. For, in the first place, as regards Van Gratten v Digby, the point we have to consider did not arise for discussion or determination. There was no question there about capacity to contract. It was a settlement made by people of mature age, binding upon them when made, and Lord Romilly was clearly right in saying that that was a contract which was to be decided according to the law of England regardless of any change of domicile afterwards. But here we are faced with a difficulty which arises from the capacity to contract, and that difficulty does not appear to me to be touched, and still less governed, by the decision in Van Gratten v Digby—p. 511.

LORD CRANWORTH.—Now, whatever be the difficulties in such cases as the present, I think the doctrine that no divorce in Scotland resting merely on a forum domicilii, had, at all events before the passing of our English Divorce Act in 1857, any effect in England on the validity of an English marriage, is established on the highest authority. It is impossible to have a stronger authority for this than the case of Lolley, for it was decided that by the twelve judges that by the second marriage he was guilty of bigamy, though on general principles every leaning in a criminal case would be in favour of the party accused. That case was followed by Dr. Lushington in Conway v Beazley (3 Hag. Ecce Rep. 639). There, as in the present case, the second marriage was had in Scotland, not, as in Lolley's Case, in England. . . and it was attempted on that ground to distinguish the two cases. But Dr. Lushington held that the principle was the same wherever the second marriage was solemnized, for that, as neither of the parties to the first marriage had been, at any time, bona fide domiciled in Scotland, the principle of Lolley's Case must prevail.—p. 70.

LORD WESTBURY. . . Lolley's Case was, without question, rightly decided, but it does not involve the conclusion that the judges held the Scotch decree of divorce of no effect because an English marriage was indissoluble by English law. There are other and legitimate grounds of decision to which the judgment in Lolley's Case may, and in my opinion ought, to be referred. Throughout the Scotch proceeding the domicile of both parties was in England, and the residence in Scotland was temporary only, and intended only for the purpose of having a suit for divorce instituted. The judge, therefore, was not the judge of the domicile; the suit was not bona fide, and the whole proceeding was in fraud of English law, and injurious to English interests. It has been supposed that Lolley's Case was recognised by Lord Eldon in the case of Toley v Lindsay (1 Dow 117), which came before this House in 1813. But on an examination of the judgments in that case in Dow's Reports, it will be seen that one main difficulty felt by Lord Eldon as to the validity of the Scotch divorce arose from the circumstances of the parties not being domiciled in Scotland at the time of the decree. So Dr. Lushington, in the case of Cowsey v Beazley, appears to have thought that the true ground of the invalidity of the decree of divorce in Lolley's Case was the fact of the parties not being domiciled in Scotland at the time—p. 85.

SELBOERNE, L.C.—It is said that Lord Brougham in the case of McCarthy v. Decaix, decided that because the solemnisation of the marriage with an English woman had taken place in England, therefore the Danish Court could not, under these circumstances, dissolve the marriage. I have all due respect for the judicial decisions of all who have at any time filled the office of Lord Chancellor. I have great respect for the high reputation of Lord Brougham, but I am compelled to speak without much respect of the decision in McCarthy v. Decaix, not only because it seems to me to proceed upon a view of Lolley's Case which is not really tenable, but also because it is a decision which, upon principle, universally recognised, would be incapable of being supported even if it were true that the English Court ought not to have recognised that Danish divorce; because, beyond all doubt on that supposition both the husband and the wife lived and died domiciled in Denmark and the distribution of both their personal estates would by a law which is beyond controversy, fall to be regulated in England and everywhere by the law of Denmark and not by the law of England and, therefore, unless it had been ascertained that the law of Denmark under these circumstances would not distribute those estates in the same manner as if there had been a valid divorce the decision manifestly lost sight of the true question in the case. I do not, therefore, think it necessary to say more about the case: McCarthy v. Decaix—p. 52.

H L (E) LORDS HALSBURY, L C, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SIAND and BRAMPTON

LORD HALSBURY, L C.—I should think that, in order to be binding on your lordships, a previous decision must be in principle, and, as applicable to the same circumstances, identical, and it appears to me that the case by which the M R thought himself bound (Lashley v Hog) is quite distinguishable both in principle and in circumstances. To omit other questions, the cardinal distinction between the French and the Scottish law is not, I think, without an important bearing upon the very question in debate, and I think it may be stated shortly thus. If the wife by the marriage in Scotland acquired no proprietary rights whatever, but only what is called a hope of a certain distribution upon the husband's death, it is intelligible that that right of distribution, or by whatever name it is called, should be dependent upon the husband's death, as following the ordinary rule that the law of a person's domicile regulates the succession of his movable property. But if by the marriage the wife acquires, as part of that contract relation, a real proprietary right, it would be quite intelligible that the husband's act should dispose of what was not his; and herein, I think, is to be found the key to Lord Eldon's judgment. He says—"The time point . . . to die intestate." It will be observed that the whole point of what Lord Eldon argues is that the whole of the property, apart from express contract, is absolutely and entirely the husband's, and that, as by law he can dispose of it as he will, it is not unconscionable that he should be at liberty to do something which by its legal effect will change what I think are inaccurately described as what would have been the rights of the wife if no change had taken place, because in substance she has, until the husband's death, no rights at all. Doubtless it is true that, according to the authorities on Scottish law, the right of the wife is no right at all in its strict sense. When speaking of the ius mariti it is described as a legal assignment to the husband, and in commenting on this authority, the late Mr Fraser, while at the Scottish Bar, in his book on the "Law of Husband and Wife" (2nd ed), vol 1, p 677, says: "At a very early period . . . that fell under common law." How different the position of the wife is under the French law is sufficiently indicated, in contrast to the above extract, by sect. 1443 of the Code Civil. And if the propositions are put shortly—that the wife acquires no proprietary rights by marriage under the Scotch law at all, but under the French law acquires a real proprietary right, the distinction between the two systems is evident enough. The communio bonorum in Scotland is a mere fiction. In France it is a reality, and in England, as the M R says, the parties to the litigation now being discussed, Mr and Mrs. Hog, were both English, married in England, where he unsettled property, existing and after-acquired, became the property of Mr Hog by the mere fact of the marriage, and gave Mrs. Hog no proprietary right whatever to the movable property in question. Once it is admitted that the marriage gives a proprietary right (and therein is the importance of the distinction Lord Eldon took between what was inaccurately argued in that case as a proprietary right conferred by the fact of marriage, and a real proprietary right conferred by specific contract), the anomaly pointed out by the M R, and sought to be explained, becomes at once intelligible. It is only material as illustrating what was the prevailing train of thought in the minds of Lord Eldon and Lord Rosslyn. Both of them speak of the words "implied contract," by which I presume they mean implied from the relation of husband and wife, and not unnaturally they deduce the conclusion that if it is implied from that relation only, the husband's change of domicile may bring with it the consequential change from such relation. Here, however, as I have endeavoured to point out, the French marriage confers not only an implied, but an actual binding partnership proprietary relation fixed by the law upon the person of the spouses, the binding nature of which, it appears to me, no act of either of the parties contracting marriage can affect or qualify. I can only account for the absolutely inaccurate use of the Scottish term ius relictæ as arising from a reference to a dispute that appears to have existed in the Scottish authors as to whether those rights flowed from the communion, whereas, to quote again from Mr. Fraser's book, p 671, he says "It has been found . . . before there." It is for this reason, as I understand that, when once Lord Eldon came to the conclusion that the husband and wife had become Scottish domiciled spouses, the property not affected by a previous complete and irrevocable right would properly be distributed according to Scottish law. It follows, therefore, if I am right, that that case is not binding on this House, and that we are at liberty to decide the question now in dispute in accordance with reason and common sense—pp 112—111

LORD WESTBURY. In advising to Mr Justice Story's work, I am obliged to dissent from a conclusion stated in the last edition of that useful book, and which is thus expressed:

"The result of the more recent English cases seems to be that for a change of national domicile there must be a definite and effectual change of nationality." In support of this proposition the editor refers to some words which appear to have fallen from a noble and learned lord in addressing this House in the case of Moorhouse v. Lord, when in speaking of the acquisition of a French domicile, Lord Kingsdown says, "A man must intend to become a Frenchman instead of an Englishman." These words are likely to mislead, if they were intended to signify that for a change of domicile there must be a change of nationality, that is, of natural allegiance. That would be to confound the political and civil status of an individual, and to destroy the difference between patria and domicilium—p. 459.

JAMES, V.-G.—The law in this case is very clearly laid down in the judgment of Lord Westbury in the case, to which I have been referred on both sides of Udny v. Udny in the House of Lords. He says (ib. 468), "Domicil of choice is a conclusion or inference which the law derives from the fact of a man fixing voluntarily his sole or chief residence in a particular place, with an intention of continuing to reside there for an unlimited time. This is a description of the circumstances which create or constitute a domicile, and not a definition of the term. There must be a residence freely chosen and not prescribed or dictated by any external necessity, such as the duties of office, the demands of creditors, or the relief from illness; and it must be a residence fixed not for a limited period, or for a particular purpose, but generally, and indelible in the future contemplation. It is true that residence originally temporary, or intended for a limited period, may afterwards become general and unlimited, and in such a case, so soon as the change of purpose, or animus manendi, can be inferred, the fact of domicile is established." That is the rule as laid down by Lord Westbury. In substance it is the same as the rule laid down in the same case by the Lord Chancellor, and differs but slightly, I think, from the rule as laid down by Lord Chelmsford. I agree that it must be considered as differing from the rule as laid down in what may be called the intermediate class of cases in the Exchequer: In re Capdevielle, Attorney-General v. Countess de Wahlstatt; following the decision in the House of Lords, Moorhouse v. Lord, in which, if I may use the expression, that unfortunate tem. et sine patria was introduced, as if it were a question of nationality, and not of more or less permanence of residence. It does differ from these cases, but it differs in bringing back the law to that which (in my opinion) was always, before those cases, considered to have been the law, and evidently is the law as laid down by the treatise writers, viz., that domicile was to be considered as changed whenever there was a change of residence of a permanent character voluntarily assumed—p. 460.

WICKINS, V.-G.—It is universally, or all but universally, true, that in order to prove that the domicile of an adult of sound mind has been changed, an intention on his part must be shown. The question on which opinion has been differed is as to what he must be shown to have intended. According to one view it is sufficient to show that he intended to settle in a new country, to establish his principal or sole and permanent home there, though the legal consequences of so doing, on his civil status, may never have entered his mind. According to the other view, it is necessary to show that he intended to change his civil status, to give up his position as, for purposes of civil status, a citizen of one country, and to assume a position as for the like purposes, the citizen of another. This stricter view is supported by opinions of great weight, amongst others, by the Lord President, in Donaldson v. MoChare, that of the Lord Chief Baron Pollock in Attorney-General v. Countess de Wahlstatt, and by some expressions used by the late Lords Cranworth and Kingsdown. . . . And cases like Haldane v. Eckford, where the change of civil status can be shown to have been recognised and accepted by a person who had no special reason to desire, and probably did not desire it, are very rare indeed. The stricter rule would therefore, in the very great majority of cases, leave the domestic to be governed by equity, which, it seems to me, would be in every respect a convenient view. But I cannot satisfy myself that the stricter rule, as I have called it, can be considered as the law of England (p. 613).

• KEKEWICH, J.—There are two cases, Crichton's Trust, In re, in the Court of Chancery, and Ferguson's Trust, In re, decided by the M. R. in Ireland—where the infants were Scotch. In each case the infant had reached the age of puberty, and though not having attained his majority and not ex juris in England or Ireland, yet it was proved that the infant was competent to give a discharge in Scotland. That of itself may make a difference, and . . . in the Irish case it was proved that security was given for the due performance of his duties respecting the fund by the curator in Scotland. That seems to me to make a considerable difference. From the other cases I do not think I can get much assistance. In Brown's Trust, In re, no doubt the V. O. made the order. The petitioner adduced evidence to show that by the law of Prussia he was entitled, in his capacity of guardian of the infant, to receive the fund and administer it during the infant's minority—which is exactly what the petitioner says here—and the V. O., on hearing the evidence, made the order. What further evidence there was, or what influenced his judgment, it is extremely difficult to say. It is a very short note of an unopposed petition to which there was no respondent; and I do not think it is a case which can be relied upon as establishing the principle. Then Hellmann's Will, In re, is still further from doing so.—p. 352.

FRANKLIN, J.—The other case is that of Black- wood v. The Queen, in the Privy Council. The judgment was given by Sir Arthur Hobhouse, he says, "It does not appear . . . as is shown by the cases of Praton v. Thevenet Molville (8 Cl. & F. 1), Chab v. Greville (2 Drew. 280)." I think you may take a slight exception to the language of that I do not think Sir Arthur intended to say that in every country where a deceased man may have left assets they are to be distributed so as to give the creditors of that country priority, or that he means to assert that in Ireland, for instance, an Englishman who had been trading with an Irish merchant would not have as great a right to be paid pari passu as anyone else, but whatever the law in France or India may be, the law of England has always been that you must enforce claims in this country according to the practice and rules of our Courts, and according to the creditors, whether from the furthest north or furthest south, is entitled to be paid equally with other creditors in the same class. I must refuse to alter that which has always been the law of this country, and which I must say, for the sake of honesty, I hope will always be the law of this country. I may add, that there seems to be some mistake in the case of Wilson v. Lady Dunsany, it is unfortunate that the case was even reported —p. 179.

OBELMSFORD, L.O.—The case of Talleyrand v. Boulanger was cited to show that a party has no right to avail himself of a foreign law which gives him a better remedy than he could be entitled to in the place where the cause of action arises. But that case has really no application [The Lord Chancellor then stated the facts] Lord Loughborough said [in Talleyrand v. Boulanger]: "I am not prepared to say how far this Court will finally give redress, but I will not allow the defendant to avail himself of any advantage got by duress which is the sole cause of the new engagement." There was, however, no duress in the case in the legal sense of that word, for, although the law of France would not have allowed an arrest, yet the plaintiff was entitled to avail himself of all the remedies which the law of this country afforded him for the recovery of the debt. This very point was decided between two foreigners in the case of De la Vega v. Vianna, where Lord Tenterden said "A person suing in this country must take the law as he finds it. He cannot, by virtue of any regulation in his own country, enjoy greater advantage than other suitors here, and he ought not, therefore, to be deprived of any superior advantage which the law of this country may confer;" and in the case of Don v. Lippmann, Lord Brougham, in advising the House, said "The law on this point is well settled in this country, where this distinction is generally taken, that whatever relates to the remedy to be enforced must be determined by the lex fori, the law of the country to the tribunals of which the appeal is made." The proceedings of the plaintiff in Talleyrand v. Boulanger might have been harsh, but they were not contrary to law, and, therefore, there was no more duress in the case than there would be in the case of a person lawfully arrested giving a bail bond to the sheriff to obtain his discharge out of custody. A Court of law would not, under the circumstances (as the Lord Chancellor supposed), have discharged the defendant upon common bail. For this the case already mentioned of De la Vega v. Vianna is a direct authority. I do not, therefore, see how equity could properly interfere to restrain the actions which, however oppressive, as Lord Loughborough thought them, arose out of remedies enforced by the plaintiff for the recovery of his debt, of which the law entitled him to avail himself.—p. 186.

KELLY, C.J., said that he thought the law was well laid down by his brother Blackburn in the above case.

AMELLETT, R.—As laid down by his brother Blackburn, in Schibehy v Westenholz, if he is a subject of the country or owes it a qualified allegiance as by residence, he will be bound by the law and procedure of the country, or if he has selected the tribunal himself, or perhaps, if at the time of the contract the defendant was in the foreign country, although I agree with my brother Blackburn that this last proposition requires consideration—p. 600.

JAY, J.—Then arises the question how far the defendant is bound by it [a decision of a foreign Court], and the law upon this point, I think, I may conveniently take from the case of Schibehy v Westenholz, which has been so much discussed in the course of the argument. In that case, the Court considered the principles on which foreign judgments are enforced by Courts of this country, and they said (at p. 169), "We think for the reasons there given . . . is a defence to the action." What are the circumstances which have been held to impose upon the defendant the duty of obeying the decision of a foreign Court? Having regard to that case, and to Coyle v Adamson (L. R. 9 Ex. 345), they say, I think, he stated thus: Courts of this country consider the defendant bound where he is a subject of the foreign country in which the judgment has been obtained, where he was resident in the foreign country when the action began, where the defendant in the character of plaintiff has selected the forum in which he is afterwards sued; where he has voluntarily appeared; where he has contracted to submit himself to the forum in which the judgment was obtained, and, possibly, if Brequet v MacCarthy (2 B & Ad. 951) be right, where the defendant has really stayed within the foreign jurisdiction, in respect of which the cause of action arose whilst he was within that jurisdiction—p. 370.

Voinet v Barrett (1885) 54 L. J. Q. B. 521 (N.B.—Voinet v Barrett was carried to the Court of Appeal (55 L. J. Q. B. 39 (1886), 34 W R 101), the judges of which, whilst affirming the judgment of Wills, J. on the point of law which was raised as to the effect of the appearance by the defendant, reversed it as to the particular facts of the case.)

WILLS, J.—In 1870, there was the case, which has been so much discussed, of Schibehy v Westenholz. Mr Justice Blackburn, in delivering the judgment of the Court, sums up what he conceives to be the result of the authorities. I do not know that I should go further into this part of the question, except for the fact that undoubtedly there seems to me to have been a misapprehension, in the course of that judgment, as to what had been decided by some of the cases which were under review. Inasmuch as it is very desirable to clear away any misapprehension of that sort, I think it is only right I should point out how it is that, as it appears to me, there was misapprehension as to what was decided in the cases of The General Steam Navigation Co. v. Gullion and De Cassa Brasas v. Rathbone, respectively. The learned judge says, after citing the passage from the case of The General Steam Navigation Co. v. Gullion, which I have already read, "It will be seen from this that those very learned judges, besides expressing an opinion conformable to ours, also expressed one to the effect that the plaintiffs in that suit did not put themselves under an obligation to obey the foreign judgment merely by appearing to defend themselves against it. On the other hand, in Singapore v. Pogo (1 Horn. & M. 195, 32 L. J. Ch. 249), where the mortgages of an English ship had come into the Courts of Louisiana to endeavour to prevent the sale of their ship seized under an execution against the mortgagors, and the Courts of Louisiana decided against them, the Vice-Chancellor and the very learned counsel who argued in the case seem all to have taken it for granted that the decision of the Court of Louisiana would have bound the mortgagors had it not been in contemptuous disregard of English law" (that is to say, the Court there, professing to deal with English law, had correctly stated what they believed to be English law, and then decided against it, although it was said, according to all legal principles, which they admitted, it ought to be decided by English law). "The case of The General Steam Navigation Co. v. Gullion was not referred to, and therefore cannot be considered as dissented from, but it seems clear that they did not agree in the latter part of the opinion there expressed." I have pointed out already that the case of De Cassa Brasas v. Rathbone was cited and relied upon, and in that case The General Steam Navigation Co. v. Gullion was under discussion, and therefore, although it is not specifically mentioned in the report of the argument, in that sense it is dissented from, because the judgment which had really dissented from it, and which cannot be considered as anything else than a formal judgment dissenting from it, had been followed and approved. The judgment goes on to say, "We think it is better to leave this question open, and to express no opinion as to the effect of the appearance of a defendant, where it is so far not voluntary that he only comes in to try to save some property in the hands of the foreign tribunal." Now, certainly, unless I misunderstand that sentence in its connection with what goes before, it seems rather to point to the view, that in the case of Simpson v Fogo and in the case of The General Steam Navigation Co v Guilden in each of those cases the defendant had appeared to try to save some property in the hands of the foreign tribunal, and it was decided one way by one decision and the other by the other. I cannot find in the pleadings in The General Steam Navigation Co v Guilden that there was any allegation of that kind, and it seems to me, as far as one can gather from the pleadings in The General Steam Navigation Co v Guilden that that was a case, as far as it appears, of a purely voluntary appearance, and under no compulsion or duress, or anything of that kind. "But we must observe," the judgment goes on to say "that the decision in De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone is an authority that where the defendant voluntarily appears and takes the chance of a judgment in his favour, he is bound." I cannot help thinking with Mr. Abrahams, that in that phraseology the voluntary appearance which is attributed to the case of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone really means an appearance voluntary as contradistinguished to one made under that species of duress, which consists of the necessity of attempting to save your property from execution if you do not appear at all. Whereas, as I have pointed out, in the case of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone the allegation in the plea was that the defendant had property in France which he wished to save from possible execution, and therefore for that reason he appeared. Therefore, it seems to me rather that if the decisions in the case of The General Steam Navigation Co v Guilden and that of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone had been misapplied, and the decision which was really that of the latter case attributed to the former, and that of the former case attributed to the latter. If so, it seems to me to be incorrect to say that that particular question was at that time still undecided, because it seems to me that it is impossible to distinguish the case of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone from the present case, and that it is impossible to deny that in that case it was expressly alleged that the appearance of the defendant was not to save property then in the hands of the tribunal, but, what is really as cogent a species of duress, from the necessity of saving other property from execution in case a judgment by default should be obtained in the Court. It seems to me, therefore, that that question really in the year 1870 was not an open question, and it is not an open question now as far as decisions go—p 524.

BOWEN, L.J.—Martin, B., said (in Winter v. Bartholomew). "The case of Holler v. Laurie seems to me to proceed on the fallacy that there are two rights of action against the sheriff, one for entering the house, and another for seizing the goods; whereas in truth there is but one right of action in respect of the whole transaction, and, as to that, the Interpleader Act enables the Court to stay proceedings. Such has been the constant practice. If, indeed, the sheriff, in the execution of the writ, has committed any real grievance, the Court will allow the injured party to bring an action, but if he has done no real wrong, the Court will stay proceedings against him." It seems to me impossible not to say that the decision in Winter v. Bartholomew has displaced Holler v. Laurie, except so far as that case may be treated as distinguished on the ground on which it was distinguished in Winter v. Bartholomew—p. 881.

Forster v. Clowess (1807) 66 L. J. Q. B. 693, [1897] 2 Q. B. 362, 76 L. T. 825.—C.A. ESHER, M.R. and SIMTH, L.J.; RIGBY, L.J. dissenting, explained
Stern v. Tegner (1897) 66 L. J. Q. B. 859; [1898] 1 Q. B. 37; 77 L. T. 847, 46 W. R. 82; 4 Manson 328.—C.A. LINDLEY, M.R. and CHITTY, L.J.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Where it is doubtful whether the security is sufficient to pay off the secured creditor or not, what is the right course to take in that case? The proper course in such a case is for the Court to say, "Unless you, the execution creditor, will guarantee the secured creditor against loss by sale, we will not order a sale." Here the execution creditor and the trustee have declined to redeem, and declined to give any guarantee at all against any loss in the case. Upon the evidence, I do not think that a sale would realise sufficient to pay off the bill of sale altogether. Under these circumstances, how can it be just to enforce a sale and deprive him of his security? It would be an abuse of the rule [Order 67, rule 12] not to put it into operation in a case to meet which it was passed. It is said that this view is opposed to a decision of this Court in Forster v. Clowess. I do not think so at all. It appears to me perfectly consistent with it. What the C.A. did there was this. They were satisfied that there was enough to pay off the bill of sale holder that which they considered was the sum properly payable to him. I think the Court went a long way in anticipating the date of payment. That is nothing. I am satisfied they never would have deprived him of his security. What they did was this. They were satisfied there was enough to pay principal and interest and costs, in their judgment, according to what they thought was right, they were satisfied, in other words, that upon the sale, and the payment to him in full of what they thought he was entitled to, there would be a surplus left for the execution creditor. That is quite a different case —pp. 861, 862.

GRANWORTH, L C—I cannot conceal from myself that in thus holding that the relative position of mortgagee and mortgagor does not give a title to the debtor to file a bill of interpleader I may be disregarding the authority of Fenn v Edmonds; but, with all respect to Sir J Wigram, I must say, if the case is fully and accurately reported, it is one that I cannot follow. It appears to me to proceed on the assumption that assignees in bankruptcy are bound to be active in confirming a prior assignment made by the bankrupt, if called on for the purpose by the person who has to pay, or, if not, that they may be treated as setting up a claim to what has been assigned. I can find no warrant for such a doctrine; it is, in truth, a further assurance which is asked for, and which, except by reason of a special contract, no one is bound to make. I collect from the note of Wood, V C's judgment that he entertained great doubt as to the decision in Fenn v Edmonds.—p 988.

BRAMWELL, L J.—The only case at all in favour of the plaintiffs is Crawshaw v Thornton. That was a case of a bill of interpleader filed under the practice formerly existing in the Court of Chancery, and it is unnecessary to consider whether it was correctly decided, for in the cases before us the summonses were issued under 1 & 2 Will 4, c 58, and, as I have before intimated, the facts appear to fall precisely within the words of that statute. But I wish also to remark that Crawshaw v Thornton was decided before the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 12, and, from my own knowledge, as one of the Common Law Commissioners, I can say that it was intended to do away with the effect of that decision.—p 455.

WILLS, J. (for self and GRANTHAM, J.)—The substance of this decision (Carnie v Brice) is that the execution creditor, having a title prima facie lawful, can only be defeated by a person showing a better title of some sort, and that the trustees of the wife's settlement, not being in possession, and having no title themselves, could not give themselves title by showing that someone else had a title superior to that of both themselves and the execution creditor. Let the execution creditor and that person settle the question between themselves—p. 136

MATHEW, J.—But there is a distinction between this case and that of Richards v Jenkins, which prevents its application, for at the time when the execution creditor executed the bill of sale to the grantee she had an equity of redemption in them [the goods], and that that later bill of sale the equity passed to the claimant, so that he was entitled to come forward and say to the sheriff that he claimed the goods. The sheriff could not sell as against McCulloch, the mortgagee, and the claimant had the equity of redemption in the goods. Now in Richards v Jenkins there was absolutely no title in the claimant. That differentiates the two cases.—p. 12

CAYE, v.—The sole point to be decided is the meaning of Ord. L.A. 12 of the County Court Rules, 1839, and the question is whether the costs in this case come under the scale of costs above 50*l.*, as the learned judge of the County Court has found, or not. The value of the goods is found by the learned judge to be 51*l.*, and he awarded 10*l.* as damages. These sums make together the sum of 61*l.*, and on that sum the learned judge has given the claimant costs on the scale above 50*l.* I do not see how he could have done anything different. It appears, however, that the execution creditor relies upon Brown v. Lilley. I need not distinguish it from the present case because it is no authority whatever upon the construction of Ord. L.A.
r. 12; the portion of the judgment relied on by the execution creditor is a mere obiter dictum, not having anything to do with the point decided.
It is clear that the claimant cannot stop when he has proved his title to the goods up to the value of the amount paid into Court. The true test is the value of the whole of the goods seized and claimed by him, and it was therefore necessary for the claimant to go on and prove not only that the goods were of the value of 51*l.*, the sum paid into Court but that the whole of the goods belonged to him. This he did, and the County Court judge was therefore perfectly right in the order he made.—per 407.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court)—It remains for us, however, to notice a case, which certainly is not distinguishable from it, and which must therefore, if its authority be adopted, determine the present Lord Kelyon is reported to have held at Vis. Privy [in Jackson v. Attrill], that the price of spirituous liquors sold by the agent of a liquor merchant on his account, to the keeper of an eating-house in quantities under the value of 20s. was recoverable notwithstanding the statute, and the ground of the decision is stated to have been that he "thought this case did not fall within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Act of Parliament, the intent of which was to prohibit the sale of such small quantities to the consumer," that "the liquors were not sold to the defendant for his own consumption, but for the use of guests resorting to his house in the way of his trade, and, therefore, in his lordship's opinion, not within the Act of Parliament."

It now becomes our duty, after argument and upon deliberation (the absence of which circumstances so much impairs the authority of a Nisi Prius decision, whatever weight may be justly due to the opinion of the particular judge), to give our construction upon the statute. The preamble certainly alludes to the mischief noticed by Lord Kenyon, the increase of immoderate drinking of spirituous liquors by persons of the lowest sort: which is attributed, in a great measure, to the description of persons who had obtained licenses to retail the same, and to those who had presented to retail the same without any licence. And accordingly, the first eleven sections of the Act are directed to the object of putting these persons under better and more strict regulations. Then comes the 12th section, upon which the question turns, and which has been already quoted. Now that the prohibition is, in terms, of all sales of spirituous liquors to a less amount than 20s., it is impossible to doubt, and to introduce an exception not there to be found, and which, if intended, might have been so easily introduced and expressed is, we think, to entail and abridge the meaning of plain words in a manner which no rule of construction, of which we are aware, warrants.

We have purposely declared noticing the language of Lord Tenterden in giving the judgment of the Court in the last cited case of Burniat v Hutehinson (5 Barn & Ald 241), which is to the following effect, . . .

We agree to this construction, and think we ought to adopt it. The consequence is that our judgment must be for the defendant—p. 300

HAWKINS, J.—It has been argued that this matter might have been the subject of an appeal to sessions and that, therefore, mandamus is not the proper remedy. Perhaps that might have been so if the judgment of the Court had been announced to her, and in that case we should probably have refused to make this rule absolute. But how is an applicant, who does not know the grounds upon which a decision is given, and who desires to appeal to the sessions, to frame her notice of appeal when she does not even know what she is appealing against? All that was said was "Res judicata," and the licence was refused. Was it refused because the house was frequented by disorderly persons, or because the applicant was not the real owner of the house—or on what ground was it refused? I really cannot see how she could appeal against such a decision as this. The circumstances here appear to me sufficiently to distinguish the case from Reg. v. Smith, for here the magistrates' society (I do not use the word offensively) adjudged that the licence should be refused, and did not, as it seems to me, hear and determine the application according to law. The whole case on both sides must be presented to them, and they will then be in a proper position to adjudge upon it—pp 142, 143.

FIELD, J.—In that case the tenant of premises in respect of which a licence had been previously granted applied for a renewal, on the ground that the previous tenant had neglected to apply at the general sessions for the licence to be renewed, and that under sect 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, it was open to the justices, where the previous tenant had neglected to apply, to grant the renewal. In the present case, however, there is no ground for claiming the benefits of sect. 14, which apply only to cases of neglect or wilful omission on the part of the previous occupier. The appellant is seeking to read into sect. 16 [of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49] the provisions of sect. 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828, which apply to an entirely different set of circumstances. Under the latter section [sect. 15], when a licensed person has, by reason of a conviction for felony, become personally disqualified or had his licence forfeited, application may be made by or on behalf of the owner of the premises to a Court of summary jurisdiction for authority to carry on the business on the premises "until the next special sessions for licensing purposes," when a further application for the grant of a licence must be made. If the Legislature had intended that all the provisions of sect. 14 of 9 Geo. 4. c. 61, should apply, they would have said so, but though certain procedure of sect. 14 is adopted, sect. 15 of the Act of 1874 expressly limits applications to the "next special sessions for licensing purposes," and not to any special sessions, as under sect. 14 of the Act of 1828.—p. 169.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—We decided Reg. v. Market Bosworth JJ. [56 L. J. M. C. 96] upon facts exactly like the present. We decided it upon the authority of Reg. v. Liverpool JJ., and our decision has never been questioned. If the matter were res integra, I should probably not decide as I am deciding, but in a matter of this kind it is very important to abide by former decisions, and as the applicant in the present case was in the position in which McGrath would have stood, we are bound to follow the decision of the C.A., and to hold that the justices were wrong. They ought to have followed the decision in Reg. v. Liverpool JJ., and should have heard the appellant when he applied for a renewal of the licence.—p. 47.

 Boulter v. Kent JJ (1897) 66 L. J. Q. B. 787,
 81 J. P. 532—H. L. (K) LORDS HALSBURY, L. C., WATSON, HERSCHHELL, SHAND and DAVEY.
 LORD HERSCHHELL.—It is said that the effect of the provision contained in the (Summary Jurisdiction) Act, 1884 (sect. 7), was to make the

that the words "conviction or order" are not even used as meaning the decision that a conviction shall take place or an order be made, but refer to the conviction and order themselves, in their technical sense. The refusal to grant a licence may be regarded as a decision of the licensing justices, but what is the "order" founded thereon? Sub-sect. 6, in my mind, puts the matter beyond doubt. No allusion was made sect. 31 of the Act of 1879, which limits the operation of that section to persons entitled to appeal from the "the conviction or order" of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. It seems to have been assumed by the learned judges that if the licensing justices were a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, it necessarily followed that all appeals from these decisions came within the terms of and were regulated by the provisions of sect. 31. I do not think so.

An applicant to whom a licence is refused has undoubtedly by the Act of 1828 a right of appeal, for that statute confers on him a right to appeal from "any act" of the licensing justices.
 But can it be said that he is thereby authorised to appeal from a "conviction or order"? The appeal authorised is certainly not one from a "conviction"; is it an appeal from an "order"?
 Even if I had to construe the language of the introductory part of sect. 31 alone, without the light thrown upon it by the subsequent provisions, my answer must be in the negative.

Sect. 31 forms part of an Act to amend the law relating to the summary jurisdiction of magistrates.
 What is meant by the summary jurisdiction of magistrates is, of course, perfectly well understood by every lawyer, and in relation to that jurisdiction the words "conviction" and "order" have a well defined meaning. The conviction follows on an information, the order on a complaint. When the licensing justices grant an application for a licence they sign a certificate by means of which the licence is obtained. But where they refuse the application they make no order at all. They simply do not grant the licence applied for. An order is never drawn up, and to speak of the act of the justices in not granting a licence as an order would be, I think, a misuse of the term. When the other provisions of sect. 31 are examined the matter becomes even clearer. The first sub-section prescribes that the appeal must be made to the next quarter sessions holden not less than fifteen days "after the day on which the decision was given, upon which the conviction or order was founded," thus showing point of law, may require a case to be stated.

 The words "determination or other proceeding" are here added, indicating that every determination of justices was not regarded as comprised in the word "order."

I have not yet referred to sub-sect. 2 of sect. 31, which was much discussed in the argument at the Bar. That sub-section prescribes that the appellant shall give notice of appeal to "the other party." There is no difficulty in applying this provision in cases where magistrates exercise summary jurisdiction as commonly understood.
 Where proceedings are taken by way of information or complaint which end or may end in a conviction or order, there are always two parties —the person instituting the proceedings and the person against whom the proceedings are taken.
 It has been held that, where the appeal is against the refusal to grant a licence, a person who has objected to the grant of the licence before the licensing justices is "the other party" within the meaning of sect. 31. No doubt, if it be assumed that the section includes such a case the words "the other party" could not very well apply to any one else. But, to me, the provision for notice to the other party is an additional reason for thinking sect. 31 inapplicable to appeals against the refusal of justices to grant a licence. Persons objecting to the grant of a licence are not, I think, parties to the proceedings on the application in any proper sense of the term. The question is not one inter partes at all. The justices have an absolute discretion to determine, in the interest of the public, whether a licence ought to be granted, and every member of the public may object to the grant on public grounds, apart from any individual right or interest of his own. The applicant seeks a privilege. A member of the public who objects merely informs the mind of the Court to enable it rightly to exercise its discretion whether to grant that privilege or not. A decision that a licence should not be granted is a decision that it would not be for the public benefit to grant it.
 It is not a decision that the objector has a right to have it refused. It is not, properly speaking, a determination in his favour. It is, I think, a failure to treat the refusal as necessarily induced by a particular objector. Every member of the local community might object. Would they all then become "the other party"? There is, in truth, no lis, no controversy inter partes, and no decision in favour of one of them and against the other, unless, indeed, the entire public are regarded as the other party, for if a licence be refused on the ground that it was not needed to supply the legitimate wants of the neighbourhood, the decision is really in favour of the public at large. The provision contained in sub-sect. 2 seems therefore to me an additional reason for holding that an appeal from the "net" of the justices in refusing a licence is not an appeal from a conviction or order of a Court of summary jurisdiction.

I see no inconvenience in such a conclusion, quite the reverse. It is said that the object of sect. 31 was to introduce uniformity of procedure in appeals to quarter sessions. A laudable object, and calculated to be useful when applied to a class of cases similar in their character. But there does not appear to me to be any reason for straining the language of sect. 31 so as to make it embrace a very different class of cases provided for by special legislation. That legislation has never been expressly repealed, and I do not think it has been repealed by necessary implication, for an enactment which regulates appeals against a "conviction or order" of a Court of summary jurisdiction, does not, in my opinion, conflict with an enactment which prescribes the method and conditions of an appeal against "any act" of the licensing justices.

The Court of Appeal arrived at the conclusion that they did in the Glamorganshire Case and in the present case because they felt bound to attribute to the words of the definition clause their natural meaning. I have been guided by the same principle in interpreting the language of sect. 31 of the Act of 1879, which seems to me to have been somewhat lost sight of.

Although the views I have expressed involve the decision that Reg. v. Glamorganshire JJ was wrongly decided, they do not necessarily conflict with the judgment in Reg. v. Pontypool JJ, in which it was held that the licensing justices were bound under sect. 33 of the Act of 1879 to state a case for the opinion of the Court. That section, as I have already pointed out, entitles an aggrieved party who desires to question any "determination" of a Court of summary jurisdiction as erroneous in point of law to have a case stated. And a decision not to grant a licence is undoubtedly a "determination" of such Court if the licensing justices are a Court of summary jurisdiction. Though it is not necessary to decide the point, I feel bound to say that as at the present advised, I am not satisfied that the conclusion arrived at on this point in the Courts below is a sound one. Looking at the scope of the Act of 1879, at the fact that sect. 7 of the Act of 1884 purports to be declaratory and not enacting, and that it is difficult to suppose that it was intended to enact that every justice when doing any act under any authority which he possesses is a Court of summary jurisdiction, my present impression is that the enactments defining a Court of summary jurisdiction may well be construed as meaning no more than this—that every justice is a Court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Act of 1879, or any other law relating to summary jurisdiction, in all matters pertaining to the exercise of summary jurisdiction by magistrates, however he may have derived his authority to exercise that jurisdiction—p. 792—795.

KENNEDY, J.—A question has been raised as to the power of the Court to award costs to the respondents who appear here as the successful opponents of the rule nisi; the mandamus being made absolute.

The Court has always exercised its discretion in such cases, but the discretion has generally been exercised in favour of granting costs to a successful respondent if he is such a person as the Court deems to be entitled to appear by reason of his interest in the matter before the Court. The decision of the H. L. in Boulter v. Kent JJ does not appear to have interfered with such discretion. This is not the case of a successful appellant to quarter sessions asking for an order that the objector who has not appeared on the appeal should pay the costs of the appeal. In the present case we have a party opposing who has appeared, has been heard, is interested, and has asked for his costs in respect of his opposition to the application to this Court. We think that the respondents were justified in appealing, and the order of the Court is that they be allowed their costs—p. 283

CHANNELL, J.—It is obviously convenient that the matter should be treated by certiorari. We are bound by the decisions in Boulter v. Kent JJ. [66 L. J. Q. B. 787, (1897) A. C. 556] and Reg. v. Sharmas, but a section in the Licensing Act, 1873, has been pointed out, which applies to this case, and distinguishes it from those decisions. It was pointed out by counsel for the prosecutor that, under sect. 43 of the Act of 1873, the objector is expressly made a party to the proceedings before the confirming authority, and that that authority has power to award costs to the successful party. That seems to me sufficient to dispose of the point that this was not a judicial proceeding inter partes, and a rule for a certiorari as to the decision of the confirming authority must therefore be made absolute.—p. 360.

COLERIDGE, J.—The only case cited for the appellant which raises any difficulty in my mind is that of Mullins v. Collins, where, however, I observe the late Mr Justice Aitchison says that he does not intend in any way to interfere with the maxim that before a person can be criminally convicted he must be shown to have a mens rea. But the true effect of that case may, I think, be summed up by saying that the judgment was in affirmance of a conviction. The justices had heard the whole case, and had the witnesses before them, and they had come to the conclusion on the facts that the appellant had been guilty of an offence. It may be observed that it is stated in the case that the appellant called no witnesses, but relied entirely on certain points of law, and it may be that the justices thought under the circumstances of that case that, as the appellant would not raise any affirmative case on his own behalf, he had none to raise, and the merits were in truth against him, and that they

SMITH, L.J.—That case was decided upon the view that licensing justices were a Court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but the basis of that decision has been swept away by the judgment of the House of Lords in Boulter v. Kent JJ. where it was held that licensing justices are not a Court of summary jurisdiction, and that sect. 31 of that Act did not apply.—p. 578

STEPHEN, J.—There the peculiar fact was that the appeal was against an acquittal, the justices having held that the respondent was entirely ignorant of the gambling, and the servant who it was proved did know was only a potman and not in charge of the premises. There was, therefore, no delegation of authority, and the case did not therefore come within the principle of the former cases, and the Court dismissed the appeal. That case seems to me not to conflict, but to be in accordance with the other cases. The L.C. distinguished the case from Mullins v Collins, on the ground that in that the servant was in charge and knew, or was wilfully blind; while in Somerset v Hart the potman merely knew of it as a fact, but not in discharge of his duty, nor being in charge at the time.—p. 108

KEATING, J.—I am unable to distinguish this case from Taylor v. Humphries. It has been strongly pressed upon us, that, inasmuch as the report of that case in the Last Journal makes no mention of sect. 14 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and the Lord Chief Justice does not allude to it in his judgment, we ought to assume that the attention of the Court was not called to it, and therefore we ought not to hold ourselves bound by that decision. Looking, however, at the report in 17 O. B. (N.S.) we can entertain no doubt that that provision was distinctly brought to the attention of the Court, and was present to the mind of the Chief Justice when he prepared the judgment. Not only was the statute referred to, but a case of Tennant v. Cumberland (23 J. P. 51), where it was held that the burthen of proof lay upon the innkeeper, was cited. Taylor v. Humphries, therefore, must stand unless we can see clearly that it proceeded upon a mistake. I agree with Mr. White as to the serious consequences which may ensue from our pronouncing a decision which may have the effect of repealing the proviso in question. The Court has no intention to do so upon the present occasion. Neither did Erle, C.J. in Taylor v. Humphries intend to do anything of the kind. All the Court there intended to decide was that under the peculiar words of the statute then under consideration, that which appeared to be an exception was in truth not an "exception, exception, proviso, or condition," within the proviso in sect. 14 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. And I think a contrary decision would cast upon the innkeeper an intolerable burthen; for he would then be precluded from supplying refreshment to any person whom he did not personally know. Under these circumstances I think it right to adhere to the decision in Taylor v. Humphries.—p. 176

WILLS, J.—We were pressed with the case of Stretch v. White. One would have expected that so important a case would be found in the regular reports. I do not think it is a satisfactory report. There was no considered detailed judgment. I cannot help thinking that there was a sale and a transmutation of property when the butter was set aside at the farmer's residence for delivery. If so, it is no authority binding upon us I do not think the decision as reported in the Justice of the Peace at all satisfactory, and we are therefore at liberty to decide this case upon the plain words of the statute. Upon the words of the statute I cannot entertain any doubt at all—p 237.

MALLIN, V.-C.—In the case of In re Cowbridge Ry. Co., Lord Hatherley, then Vice-Chancellor Wood, gave utterance to an opinion as to the meaning of the Act (37 & 38 Vict. c. 112), in which I cannot concur, and I must follow the view formerly taken by me in the cases of In re Bailey's Trusts and Earl of Cork v. Russell—p. 63.

Thornton v. Finch (1866) 4 Giff 516, 34 L. J. Ch. 466.—V.-C., observed upon.

SELBORNE, L.C.—The case of Thornton v. Finch shows that though the law was such as could not be specifically bound under the Act until actually delivered in execution, yet the mortgage arising from the judgment and the s. 2 Vict. c. 110, is such as can be the foundation of a bill in equity to make it a perfect charge.—p. 376.

Garth v. Emsfield Sir J. Bridgman's Reports, 22, Girling v. Lowther (1882-1883) 2 Ch. Rep. 136; and Watts v. Porter (1884) 3 El. & Bl. 743; 2 C. L. R. 1563, 23 L. J. Q. B. 345, 1 Jur. (N.S.) 153.—Q. B., observed upon.

Beavan v. Oxford (Earl) (No 2) (1866) 6 De G. M. & G. 507, 25 L. J. Ch. 299, 2 Jun. (N.S.) 121, 4 W. R. 276.—L.C. and L.J.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—I am bound to say that I do not at all feel confident that the case in Bridgman would be so decided at the present day. The other authority cited, an old case in the 2nd Volume of Reports in Chancery, is exceedingly loosely reported, and it means that which Mr. Walker contends it means, as very likely it does, all I can say is that it is inconsistent with what has been taken to be the state of the law in the subsequent cases—p. 520.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J.—If it be necessary to give any opinion on that case, I confess that, on examining it, I find it difficult to distinguish that case from the present satisfactorily. . . . On looking at the judgments I prefer that of Erle, J., to that of the other three judges on this point (i.e. equitable mortgage). . . . It seems to me, with great deference to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in that case, that sufficient attention was not paid to the distinction between the existence of the trusts and the remedy against the trustee.—pp. 532, 533.

Kendrew v. Jervis (1856) 25 L. J. Ch. 538; 22 Beav. 1, 2 Jur. (N.S.) 602; 4 W. R. 579.

BOMILEY, M.R.—Considering the difference of opinion among the judges (in Watts v. Porter) themselves, the conflicting character of that decision with the decisions previously referred to and the consequences to which it would lead, not the least serious of which is the blow it strikes at the foundation of morality upon which all laws are, or ought to be, based, it can hardly be expected to govern subsequent cases without confirmation. . . . The Lord Chancellor (in Beavan v. Oxford) endeavoured to distinguish Watts v. Porter, but, if not distinguishable, it was dissented from. It was also commented on and disapproved of by Turner, L.J. I concur in the decision of Beavan v. Oxford, and consider that the decision in Watts v. Porter cannot govern the present case.—p. 544.

Scott v. Hastings (Lord) (1868) 4 Kay & J. 638; 5 Jur. (N.S.) 450; 6 W. R. 862.

WOOD, V.-C.—Even if the charging order had been made absolute before notice of the mortgage, it would be impossible for me to give priority to the charge of the judgment creditor without disregarding the dicta in Beavan v Oxford (Earl) (9 De G. M. & G. 521, 525, 532), in inference to the decision of the Court of Q.B. in Watts v Porter. It is true they are dicta, for the facts in Beavan v Oxford (Earl) are distinguishable from the present case; the charge there being a charge on land. Nevertheless they are the dicta of a superior Court, and Lord Cranworth expressly and decidedly preferred the view taken in Watts v Porter by Erie, J., which is in accordance with that I have adopted, to the decision of the other learned judges, by whom that case was decided in a contrary manner. Turner, L.J. goes somewhat further, resting his decision upon an opinion directly contrary to that which was adopted in Watts v Porter. He says, in effect, that, in principle, the two cases could not be distinguished (that there was a distinction is clear, because in Watts v Porter, as here, the charge was upon personality, whereas in Beavan v Oxford (Earl) it was on real estate), and he concurs with Lord Cranworth, in giving a decided preference to the opinion of Erie, J. over that of the other judges. My judgment coincides with that of Erie, J. and . . . I must hold that, as against the mortgagee in this case, no lien was acquired by the charging order, that order having been made after the execution of the mortgage.—p. 683.

WILLIAMS, J.—The opinion of the majority of the Court in Watts v Porter created an exception on the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, to the rule which applies generally, and which was applied in this Court more than a hundred years ago in the case of the statutory execution under the bankrupt law, that the creditors can have no more than the debtors was entitled to at law as well as in equity. But, since the cases of Beavan v Oxford and Kinderley v Jarvis, it is open to grave doubts whether the opinion of Erie, J. in Watts v Porter was not the more correct one.—p. 261.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—I am aware that the Master of the Rolls seems to have taken a different view of the subject in the recent case of Shaw v. Neale. It does not, however, appear that the Irish case (Hickson v Collis) was brought under the consideration of his honour.

This was a decision at variance with what Lord St. Leonards stated in Hickson v. Collis, and which seems to me more in unison with the spirit and language of the enactment than the construction adopted by his honour. It does not appear to have been pointed out in argument that the provisions of the statute never can be complied with as to mortgages complete before the re-registry. It is impossible to re-register within five years previously to the date of the deed creating a mortgage prior to the re-registry.—p. 503

WOOD, V. C.—In re Perrin was a very different case. It was a question of construction of a statute upon words which seem to plain that I am not surprised that Lord St. Leonards said he had no doubt upon the point, and only reserved his judgment as to how far the previous statute, 6 Will. 4, c. 14, had affected the question. By that statute it was enacted, that a judgment creditor who had obtained a judgment by confession, should be in the same position in bankruptcy as a simple contract creditor. There was an Irish Act which included in one clause several things which are more distributed in the corresponding Act relating to this country, and gave certain rights to the judgment creditor, and in that Act, after giving a judgment the effect of a charge upon land, this provision occurs: "nor shall such charge operate to give the judgment creditor any preference in case of the bankruptcy of the person against whom such judgment shall have been entered up, unless such judgment shall have been entered up one year at least before the bankruptcy; provided also, that, as regards purchases, mortgages, or creditors who shall have become such before the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, such judgment shall not affect lands, tenements, or hereditaments otherwise than as the same would have been affected by such judgment if this Act had not been passed;" and the very case had arisen of creditors under a bankruptcy, which was the case contemplated by the first part of the clause which I have read. The judgment creditor claimed to have certain rights in respect of a bankrupt's property, and urged that the simple contract creditors had no right to oppose, because the word "creditor" must be taken to mean persons who were, like himself, in the position of judgment creditors. Lord St. Leonards said that was not so, for the preceding clause dealt with the case of creditors in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy was a statutory execution for the benefit of all the creditors by simple contract or otherwise equally, including judgments registered within a year before the bankruptcy, and judgments obtained by confession. Any claim of priority by such judgment creditor was the mischief intended to be prevented. The Act provided, that every judgment creditor must register his judgment within a year before the bankruptcy; and, as to creditors before the passing of the Act, judgments were not to affect lands at all. The statute did not admit of any other construction. In like manner I come in this case, to the conclusion that the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, providing that an unregistered judgment shall be void against lands in respect of creditors, can only mean to refer to creditors having no interest in the lands. It provides that the judgment shall be void unless the judgment creditor registers it within five years before the creditor's right accrued. That must be the right of the creditor in that thing, in respect of which, unless the re-registration is made, the judgment is to be void—that is to say, "lands, tenements, and hereditaments." In so deciding, I construe the statute in the mode which the preceding words render necessary, as Lord St. Leonards did regard to the statute which he had to consider in the case I have referred to—p. 76.

MARTIN, B. (delivering the judgment of the Court).—We have been pressed by the authority of this case (Slater v. Mackay). In that case the application was for the costs of an action on a judgment, and as the defendant had pleaded to that action non tunc reced, the Court of Common Pleas considered that that circumstance enabled them to exercise a discretion under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 4, and that the proper course was to give the plaintiff his costs. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is entitled to the greatest respect, and we have considered it accordingly, but cannot understand it. The question in those cases is, as the bringing an action on the judgment is a breach of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57? And how that can be affected by the defendant pleading a false plea to the action we cannot see; although certainly, if we could give the plaintiff his costs on a judgment obtained upon a false plea had been pleaded by his adversary, we would do so. As an authority on the other side, we have Bell v. Walden, where WIGHTMAN, J. obviously considered that if a party is guilty of an evasion of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, the Court is bound not to give him costs; and in that case he refused to do so. For these reasons we think that we shall best exercise the jurisdiction we possess in refusing to give costs in the present instance—p. 264.

COCKBURN, C.J.*—I dissent from the opinion expressed by the Court of Exchequer that the discretion which was vested in the Courts by 4 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 4, to order that the plaintiff should have his costs in an action brought upon a judgment, is taken away by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57—p. 184

CAVE, J.—Rex v. Meyer (infra), was not equal there [in Rex v. Gibbon], and the Court does not avert to the distinction established by that case between a substantial interest likely to cause a real bias and the mere possibility of a bias. Still we might have felt ourselves bound by the decision in that case had it not been that in White v. Rodgers (reported, but not in this point, in 5 Q B D. 15) the same question arose, and was decided the other way. Feeling ourselves thus at liberty to exercise our own judgment in the matter, we are of opinion that in cases like the present, where such a section as sect 502 of this local Act exists in order to disqualify the justices, it must be established that he has such a substantial interest in the result of the hearing as to make it likely that he has a real bias in the matter.—p. 386.

 COLLIERIDGE, C.J.—Two distinctions have been pointed out to us which, in my opinion, separate the case before us from those cited. In those cases there was no substantive preliminary proceeds by the defendants, but here there was a protest . . . There is, however, a second distinction . . . arising out of the special provision as to time for proceedings enacted by sect. 10 of the [Sale of Food and Drugs] Act of 1879 . . . Here, therefore, is a condition precedent to the trial of the offence, carefully securing to a person charged, in respect of a punishable article, an opportunity of defending himself. It appears to me that this limit of time prescribed by the Act cannot be disregarded—pp 118, 119.

MULLOK, J.—It is difficult to put a consistent construction on the first and second sections, but I think the provision which allows a summons to be left at a person's most usual place of abode must have been intended to apply to such a case as that of a tradesman or labourer, or, as in the case which has been cited (Re Williams), of a man working in a mine who would return home at regular intervals, and not to a case where a man might very likely be away for a week or ten days at a time. Rex v. Wilson (1835) 3 A. & E. 817.—K. B.—DENMAN, C. J.—In Rex v. Elwell a conviction very like the present was brought before the Court and quashed. The objection was that imprisonment was awarded full fine paid, and no fine set. The form of that conviction is copied into Burn's Justice from the third volume of Lord Raymond, and was contrasted by my brother Patteson, in Rex v. Oakley (4 B. & Ad 307), with that which was then held bad on another ground. It was then inferred that he approved of the form in Rex v. Elwell in every other particular; but surely no mode of arguing can be less just.—p 829.

Rex v. Taylor (1826) 7 D. & R. 622.—K. B., commented on and explained.

Reg. v. Chaney (1838) 6 D. P. C. 281.

PATTESSON, J.—I . . . have looked at the case of Rex v. Taylor, and without at all meaning to say that what is there decided is not good law, yet it is not an authority binding upon me, because the Court merely said there that they would not look at defects in a commitment until they had before them the conviction itself; and when it was brought before them, it appeared to be as defective as the commitment, and therefore the defendants were discharged. It is not, therefore, an authority to show that a party cannot be discharged on the ground of an error in the commitment.—p 289.

KELLY, C.B.—The prisoner is therefore entitled to his discharge, and my only doubt was caused by the case of Rex v. Taylor, where upon the authority of an old case (Rex v. Hawkins, Fortescue 272), Abbott, C.J. says, "We must suppose, until the contrary is shown, that there is a legal conviction to support the commitment. We must have the conviction brought up before we can take any notice of a defect in the warrant," and adds, "for this purpose you may have a certiorari to bring up the record and writs of habeas corpus to bring up the defendants." There, on the conviction being afterwards brought up, the prisoner was discharged. But that case is no authority for the present one. Here the habeas corpus has already been granted and the prisoner is brought up under it, and is, with the return, before the Court; and we cannot deal with it as if it were merely an application for a writ made upon matter shown by affidavits.—p. 260
